This land was, prior to September 27, 1909, Government land, open to entry, and the United States Government tacitly invited and encouraged its citizens to locate upon and develop the same under the laws then in force governing same. The persons through whom the Boston-Pacific Oil Co. claims title to said oil lands located the same in good faith, and prior to said "withdrawal order" there had been performed thereon all necessary assessment work under and in pursuance of said "placer mining laws." Thereafter the corporation, acting in good faith, purchased all rights theretofore acquired by said predecessors in interest and commenced and diligently continued the development of both of said tracts until its efforts were rewarded by the discovery of oil in paying quantities on both of said tracts, at a total cost of a sum in excess of three hundred thousand ($300,000) dollars, exclusive of the money paid to said predecessors in interest for said lands. And I respectfully submit that—having confidence in my judgment and convictions respecting the potential value of said lands and relying upon the advice given by reputable attorneys relative to the legal status thereof—we were warranted in organizing said corporation, purchasing said oil lands, and selling the shares of stock of said corporation to the public in order to raise money wherewith to develop said land.

Mr. Taft, an admittedly able jurist, at the time of his "withdrawal proclamation" stated that he seriously doubted the validity thereof. Federal Judges Dooling and Reiner, men of great legal learning and experience, decided in cases where they had the issues fairly before them against the validity of said "order"; and learned counsel of the West generally advised their clients that said "withdrawal order" was, and would be held, invalid. Yet the Government, through its Attorney General and Department of Justice, makes the contention in effect that admitting that neither Mr. Taft, Judges Dooling and Reiner, said legal counsel, nor the three dissenting Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States knew the law respecting the validity of said order, nevertheless the locators of said lands should be held strictly to the legal axiom: "Ignorantia legis neminem excusat."

Again, during all the time that we were drilling on both of said tracts the Government's agents and employees at frequent intervals visited our properties to note the progress thereon, and was fully informed relative to all our acts and proceedings, and in particular was informed that we held said land adversely to the United States, but notwithstanding such knowledge the Government made no attempt whatever to interfere with our open and notorious possession of said lands, or to dispute our title thereto, until we had succeeded in bringing in a commercial oil well on each of said tracts of land.

Subsequent to the bringing in of said wells the Government, by proclamation of the President of the United States, has placed a certain portion of the oil lands included in said "Taft withdrawal order" in the Midway district, Kern County, Cal., within "naval reserve No. 2," and now seeks to enforce the contention that by virtue of said "proclamation" the claims of the Government in and to said reserved lands are more strongly fortified, and the rights and interests of the oil operators to said lands are correspondingly weakened, and that by reason thereof the claimants of land in said "naval reserve" are not entitled to the same or equal relief that should be accorded to those holding lands outside of said "naval reserve," which contention, I submit, is not only untenable but unjust.

And now, after having given practically eight years of my time and effort to this enterprise, all the property of the Boston-Pacific Oil Co. is to-day in the custody and under the control of a Federal receiver, to wit: 160 acres of land and approximately seven hundred thousand ($700,000) dollars of impounded money; and the small stockholders of this company who can ill afford to lose their respective holdings are anxiously looking to me as president of the company to help them. You can therefore, readily appreciate the reasons for my anxiety that some fair and just remedial legislation be immediately enacted in order that the corporation may at least be saved from threatened bankruptcy.

What I have herein written respecting the justice of the claims made by, and the status of, our corporation may be applied with equal force to many other oil operators in the Midway field, whose asserted rights are in many instances based upon a state of facts which merit and demand immediate relief from the Government.

Now, my dear Senator, as I have hereinbefore stated my reasons for addressing you on this subject I feel that you will understand without further comment; and thanking you for your defense of the rights of the legitimate oil-land claimants of California, I beg to remain,

Yours, respectfully,

FRED G. KING,
President Boston-Pacific Oil Co.

ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATIONS (S. DOC. NO. 190).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of War submitting urgent estimates of deficiencies in appropriations in the sum of $30,155,000 required by the War Department, Quartermaster Corps, to complete the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 5667) to provide for the deportation of certain aliens, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 3389) to authorize and empower the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation to purchase, lease, requisition, or otherwise acquire, and to sell or otherwise dispose of improved or unimproved land, houses, buildings, and for other purposes, and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. McLEAN presented a petition of Silver City Branch, No. 227, National Association of Letter Carriers, of Meriden, Conn., and a petition of Local Branch No. 746, National Association of Letter Carriers, of Naugatuck, Conn., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of the Central Labor Union of New London, Conn., and a memorial of the Trades Council of New Haven, Conn., remonstrating against the adoption of the so-called Borland minimum eight-hour provision, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a petition of the Equal Franchise Club of Guilford, Conn., and a petition of the Political Equality Club of Meriden, Conn., praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. THOMPSON presented a petition of the Wyandotte County Rural Letter Carriers' Association, of Muncie, Kans., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

MESSENGER FOR THE MINORITY.

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred S. Res. 204, submitted by Mr. NELSON on the 11th instant, reported it favorably without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed, on and after the 4th day of March, 1918, to place on the Senate rolls a messenger for the minority at the rate of $1,200 per annum, to be paid from the miscellaneous items of the contingent funds of the Senate until the 1st day of July, 1918.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

Mr. McNARY. For my colleague, the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], who is confined in the hospital by illness, I introduce a bill and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 3977) for the relief of Clarence Chambers; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BANKHEAD:

A bill (S. 3978) to authorize the purchase of a tract of land in the District of Columbia for the purpose of building houses thereon for employees of the United States; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. ROBINSON:

A bill (S. 3979) to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to equip their locomotives with safe and suitable boilers and appurtenances thereto," approved February 17, 1911; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 3980) to prevent interference with the use of homing pigeons by the United States, to provide a penalty for such interference, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 3981) to establish an Army mine-planter service, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. 3982) to suspend certain restrictions on the purchase and distribution of military stores and supplies, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 3983) to protect Government documents by copyright; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. HOLLIS:

A bill (S. 3984) to correct the military record of Samuel C. Rowe (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 3985) for the relief of John Chick; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SAULSBURY:

A bill (S. 3986) to acquire the manuscript of Charles Chaillé-Long, containing an account of the unveiling of the McClellan statue; to the Committee on the Library.

A bill (S. 3987) for the relief of George E. Megee; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 3988) granting an increase of pension to Caleb S. Woodrow;

A bill (S. 3989) granting a pension to Ada Johnston Cowles; and

A bill (S. 3990) granting an increase of pension to John R. Megee (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. STONE:

A bill (S. 3991) granting a pension to Adolphus Lesperance; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (by request):

A bill (S. 3992) to investigate the claims of and to enroll certain persons, if entitled, with the Omaha Tribe of Indians; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. TRAMMELL:

A bill (S. 3993) to protect the lives and health and morals of women and minor workers in the District of Columbia, and to establish a minimum wage board and define its powers and duties, and to provide for the fixing of minimum wages for such workers, and to provide penalties for violation of this act; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 5667. An act to provide for the deportation of certain aliens, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Immigration.

WAR FINANCE CORPORATION.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3714, known as the war finance corporation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3714) to provide further for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOLLIS obtained the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, this is a very important bill, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HOLLIS. So far as I am concerned, I should rather the Senator would not do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, I have done so; that is the trouble.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gallinger	McCumber	Sheppard
Bankhead	Gerry	McLean	Simmons
Beckham	Gronna	McNary	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Hale	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Hardwick	Norris	Smith, Mich.
Calder	Henderson	Nugent	Sutherland
Colt	Hollis	Page	Swanson
Culberson	Johnson, S. Dak.	Phelan	Thompson
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Pittman	Tillman
Dillingham	Kendrick	Poindexter	Townsend
Fernald	King	Pomerene	Trammell
Fletcher	Kirby	Reed	Vardaman
France	Knox	Robinson	Wolcott
Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Saulsbury

Mr. McNARY (when Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S name was called). I desire to announce the absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. CUMMINS'S name was called). I am requested to announce that both the Senators from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS and Mr. KENYON] are absent from the Chamber and from the city, in Iowa, in attendance upon the funeral of the wife of the senior Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GRONNA (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE'S name was called). I announce the absence of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] because of illness in his family. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. ASHURST (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Arizona was called). My colleague, the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], is detained from the Senate by reason of illness.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. BECKHAM. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. JAMES] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I announce the absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], on account of illness.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] was recognized. Does he yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I am very anxious to give the Senator from North Carolina an opportunity to finish his speech, but my colleague had asked me if I would not yield to him for a few moments, and if the Senator from North Carolina will consent to that, I will then yield to him so that he may finish his remarks.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I asked my colleague to do me the courtesy of giving me about 10 minutes this morning to present a matter not connected with the bill under consideration, I having waited patiently three days for an opportunity to present it. I could have presented it in the morning hour quite as properly as many other things have been presented, but I thought it was better not to interrupt the morning business.

Mr. President, I am in receipt of a letter from a gentleman well known to many members of this body, who calls attention to a matter that will soon come before the Senate for action. I will take the liberty of reading the letter and follow it with some brief comments on the important subject which my correspondent discusses. The letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 21, 1918.

HON. JACOB H. GALLINGER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR GALLINGER: No argument is needed to convince even the most conservative of men of the inherent justice of the cause of woman suffrage. Some, however, have questioned its expediency, but the logic of events during the past few years must compel a change of heart and mind in even these "Doubting Thomases."

England, ever slow to make radical changes in political thought, has finally recognized both the justice of the cause and the advantage to the Nation in granting woman the vote.

No wise statesman can doubt the ultimate triumph of the cause in this country. Why, then, not concede now what we shall otherwise inevitably be forced to grant after a prolonged and unprofitable contest?

It would be a great misfortune to have this issue injected into our next political campaign, as would be the result of the defeat of the Federal suffrage amendment in this Congress. Winning the war is now the supreme duty of Americans, and the inspiring cooperation of our eager and patriotic women would be of incalculable service in promoting essential legislation by their influence at the polls.

JOHN HAYS HAMMOND.

Mr. President, the letter I have read is from the pen of a man of large affairs and broad vision, a man who has doubtless given the matter the most careful and conscientious consideration. When men such as John Hays Hammond reach the conclusion that women have a right to equal participation with men in governmental affairs it is indicative of a growing sentiment on the part of many who have heretofore been indifferent if not hostile to the equal-suffrage movement. When one stops to reflect upon the part that woman is playing in matters connected with the war in which we are engaged it forces one to the conclusion that woman has won for herself the fullest possible recognition in everything that tends to the best interests alike of the home and the State. In all the history of the world there has been no such exhibition of loyal devotion to the cause of liberty and justice as the women have manifested throughout our entire land, a devotion certainly as great as that which our soldiers are showing in the camps and on the battle fields. No sacrifice has been too great, no labor too severe or exhausting, that the women of the country have not accepted cheerfully and performed in a way that can not fail to excite the admiration and gratitude of all lovers of our institutions.

They ask now for full recognition of their political rights. Their request is reasonable and just and should be granted ungrudgingly and without hesitation. Already the House of Representatives, by more than a two-thirds vote, has passed the constitutional amendment submitting to the several States the question of conferring upon them the privilege of full citizenship, so far as suffrage is concerned. It remains for the Senate to take action on the subject, and I venture to express the hope that the requisite number of votes in this body will be secured when the matter shall be submitted for our consideration and action.

For more than 30 years I have been a believer in the right of women to vote, and I have never wavered in my conviction as to the justice of the cause. That right has been denied to women simply because men have had the power to deny it. It has been an illustration of the false doctrine that might makes right, because the principles of justice are not founded on either force or governmental decrees. I have never been able to understand why women who possess every other qualification for suffrage but that of sex should be denied participation in the affairs of the State, and I look forward with pleasant anticipation to the time when the mothers, the wives, and the sisters of men will be given the same rights, so far as the ballot is concerned, that the fathers, the husbands, and the brothers enjoy. A great opportunity is presented to the Senate to wipe out the inequality that now exists and to submit to the several States an opportunity to make our country a land of absolute equality, based upon the fundamental principles of right, justice, and humanity.

I ask that the letter of Mr. Hammond shall lie on the table, as the constitutional amendment is now on the calendar, from which I trust it will soon be taken and agreed to by the Senate.

While our boys are fighting for democracy abroad let us do our part toward establishing a real, true, genuine democracy at home.

Mr. President, I thank my colleague for his courtesy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] obtained the floor and yielded to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. HOLLIS. Giving notice that after the Senator from North Carolina finishes his remarks I hope I may obtain the floor, I will yield the floor to the Senator from North Carolina, and he may yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I wish to say merely a few words.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I am glad to see that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is taking a deep interest in the question of equal suffrage. It has been a question in which our people of Colorado have been very much interested for many years. A letter such as has been written by Mr. John Hays Hammond can not help but produce good in making people anxious to establish rights which they recognize in themselves and which belong to all humanity.

So clearly just and equitable is this right that it seems to me only one thing should be necessary to make the action of the Senate unanimous. That is simply to discuss the question. We have recognized and do recognize certain fundamental principles of government relative to the rights of human beings. To say that those fundamental principles are to apply to men but not to women is to deny the very principles themselves. We all recognize and have ever recognized that the just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed. It is for the establishment of that principle we are fighting in this great war, to make the world safe for democracy. How we can fairly eliminate women—our mothers, sisters, and daughters—from the application of that truth I can not conceive. If we do, it seems to me we repudiate the Declaration of Independence, the creation of our own political being.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. The Senator recognizes, does he not, that we have a dual form of government, and that if suffrage is so desirable, as I concede it is, each State has the right to give the suffrage to women as well as to men? Does not the Senator know that when this Government was formed the 13 sovereign States delegated certain powers to the Federal Government and certain other powers they reserved to themselves and to the people, respectively? I think the indictment of the Senator ought to be of the sovereign States rather than an indictment of the Federal Government. If suffrage is so desirable, as I said a moment ago it is, the women of the States could get suffrage through the instrumentality of the States as soon as the States themselves desire it, and I have no doubt that in nearly every State in the Union the women could get suffrage if they would address themselves to the electorate of the States in which they reside.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, as a matter of fact, I believe firmly that if the procedure were to get equal suffrage by States one at a time, it would come; but I look upon the question of woman suffrage as something more than a privilege. It is true the Supreme Court has decided that the right of a person to vote is a privilege, but it is a privilege that exists after man has assumed all the powers of government and has said: "This right shall not be extended except with my consent." That is not fair; it is simply an assumption, a usurpation of power.

Mr. President, it is true that equal suffrage would come, even by State action alone in each instance; but the Senator from Utah must remember that we have a Federal Constitution which provides the manner in which that Constitution can be amended. It can be amended in any particular when three-fourths of the States agree to it. That is the right of the States, and consequently the adoption of a constitutional amendment can not be an invasion of a State's right. When three-fourths of the States want the Constitution to contain any clause, they have a right to have it, and to deny the right would be an invasion of the rights of three-fourths of the States, and hence of each of the same. It is a question as to whether three-fourths of the States——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. In just a moment. It is a question whether three-fourths of the States will desire a matter of that kind to be in the Constitution of the United States. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that there is a proposed amendment to the National Constitution extending woman suffrage now on the calendar.

Mr. SHAFROTH. So I understand.

Mr. BORAH. Why do we not have a vote on it and dispose of it?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have not any doubt that a vote will be taken in time. I am not the chairman of the committee. I have always believed that it should be brought to a vote whenever those in charge of the measure feel that it is the proper time to bring it up.

Mr. BORAH. I state that for the reason that I do not understand why, if the proposed amendment is here for consideration, it should not be considered and disposed of.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There are a good many bills that are here pending that are not disposed of. I have three or four myself which I have not been able to get up. I think that there will be a vote. I think there ought to be a vote, and that it ought to be taken reasonably soon upon this matter.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. PHELAN. I desire to ask the Senator that he inform the Senate what States, by reason of their rigid constitutions, are not in a position by a majority vote to confer suffrage upon women?

Mr. SHAFROTH. There are a number of States that can not submit the question except under most difficult conditions. One of the States I understand provides that a constitutional amendment can only be submitted once in 10 years. Others require the joint resolution must be passed by two successive legislatures before the question can be submitted to the people. There are any number of other obstructions contained in State constitutions. But there is one consideration it does seem to me that ought to satisfy every one. It is a matter of right. It may technically be called a privilege, but morally it is an inherent right, and if the men were deprived of their votes they would insist upon it as being an inalienable right. Man would never be satisfied with a denial of the right of suffrage, except with his own consent.

Mr. President, I hope we will get the amendment soon voted upon, and I hope we shall have a fair discussion of it for a few days preceding the taking of the vote.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I simply wish to say that I do not desire to hurry this amendment in case those who are advocating it have not sufficient votes yet to put it through, but I hope sincerely that it will not be unnecessarily delayed and that we shall have a vote upon the amendment just as soon as those who are favorable to it feel safe to have a vote taken upon it.

WAR FINANCE CORPORATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3714) to provide further for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributary to the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes.

Tuesday, February 26, 1918.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, this bill is an administration measure. It was worked out very carefully in the Treasury Department with a view to meeting a recognized condition with reference to the financial situation. It was introduced contemporaneously in the House by Mr. KITCHIN, and in the Senate by myself, at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury. Because of the importance of the measure the Finance Committee, to which it was referred, has given very careful consideration and investigation to it. That committee devoted something near two weeks to hearings and to consideration, and I am very glad to be able to say to the Senate that as the result of that investigation and consideration all differences of opinion in the committee with reference to the measure were compromised and reconciled, and the measure comes to the Senate with the unanimous sanction and approval of the committee.

The Secretary of the Treasury himself appeared before the committee. His testimony is a comprehensive presentation of the financial situation and the reasons for and the necessity of the proposed legislation as a means of supplying the financial requirements of certain great industrial institutions and of public service corporations whose operations are necessary to the war preparations of the Government, and who can not in the present condition of the securities market otherwise secure necessary capital to meet their obligations.

There also appeared before the committee two members of the Federal Reserve Board, Mr. Harding, the governor, and Mr. Warburg, a prominent member of that board, both recognized authorities upon financial questions. Governor Harding told the committee that while the board had not taken official action with respect to the bill, it had approved the general principles involved as appropriate and expedient in the present situation, and he gave personal indorsement to the measure. His testimony is an exceptionally clear and forceful statement of the situation and the necessity of the legislation.

Mr. Warburg, a man of broad grasp as well as a recognized financial expert, also gave his approval to the measure. His discussion of the questions of curtailing unnecessary capital expenditures and of expansion of credit and inflation of the currency is both interesting and illuminating.

Mr. Strong, the Governor of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, and Mr. Bertron, a banker engaged in the business both in the city of New York and of Philadelphia, both well known and eminent in banking and business circles, also appeared before the committee.

These bankers, representing these great financial centers and speaking from their experience and familiarity with the financial situation of the country, expressed the opinion that legislation along the lines of this measure was necessary, and that the best financial thought of the country approved the bill as an appropriate remedy for the disturbing and threatening situation they pointed out.

There also appeared representatives of the great public-service corporations of the country. One of these gentlemen, Mr. Gadsden, appeared as the chairman of a committee representing the four great associations into which these service corporations are divided. His testimony is a frank and intelligent presentation of the difficulties which confront these corporations and the perplexing handicaps under which they labor.

Mr. Gadsden and his associates, who appeared in behalf of these corporations, strongly represented to the committee the difficulties under which these institutions are now laboring. Undoubtedly a great majority of these corporations are to-day performing indispensable services to the Government in connection with its preparation for war. This service is of various kinds. It relates, however, generally to light, transportation, and power. The tremendous operations of the Government have made necessary large expenditures on the part of these corporations to meet the incidental demands upon them for the extension of their facilities and operations.

In addition to the capital demands for these purposes, many of these institutions, in fact most of them, have large maturing obligations which must be met and liquidated. What is true of the service corporations is equally true of many of the railroad corporations, in fact nearly all of them. On account of the present financial situation growing out of the large operations of the Government and the well-known depression in the securities of these corporations, they find it practically impossible to secure capital for these purposes through the ordinary channels, and where it can be secured the rate of interest is excessive.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have read the testimony before the committee and while I may be mistaken I think I am not. It does not appear that any one appeared before the committee representing any industry in this country except public service corporations and asked for any relief. None of the great manufacturing concerns, none of the concerns manufacturing for the Government, as near as I can find out not one single industry except the public service corporations asked for relief, and I judge nobody but officials of the Government and Federal reserve banks. There may have been one bank in New Hampshire——

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator it is true that no one appeared before the committee except the Secretary of the Treasury, the two Federal reserve bank officials, the two New York and Philadelphia bankers to whom I have referred, a number of gentlemen representing public utility corporations and savings banks.

I wish to say to the Senator that the hearings were open to anyone who might desire to come. Wide publicity was given to these hearings by the press. Not only the representatives of the public-utility corporations but the industries of the country must have had knowledge of these hearings. The public-utility companies came before the committee because, I assume, they felt the bill as originally framed would not accord them the relief which they thought necessary. The other industries which will obviously be benefited by the enactment of this bill did not appear before the committee, I assume, because the bill was satisfactory to them.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. The savings banks came for the same reason that the public utilities companies came. They came because they desired that the provisions of the bill as drawn with respect to them should be amended that they might more fully participate in its benefits. The contention of the representatives of the public-utility corporations and the savings banks was that while the bill took care of the industrial corporations it did not adequately take care of them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. I wish to ask the Senator if he has any knowledge of any request from any business institutions of the country other than public-service corporations for any assistance, for I believe it to be a notorious fact that the public-service corporations, many of them broken-down concerns, have been hanging around this city for weeks in the hope of getting relief.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. I have ample reasons for believing that the business interests of the country heartily approve the bill. I want to say to the Senator, if the statements made to the committee as to the plight of the utility corporations, not only by their representatives, but by others are true, and I believe they are true, they had a right to not only hang around here but to make their situation known to Congress, and it was our duty to hear them, and in the interest of the public protect them and the public as far as possible against the disaster which appears to threaten them. If the situation which confronts them is what I believe it to be and what that evidence showed it to be, it is not a matter of conjecture or speculation, but it is a matter of absolute certainty that without Government assistance these concerns face inevitable bankruptcy, followed by disastrous consequences to every industry dependent upon the service they render, and this includes nearly all the so-called war industries.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KNOX. May I not inquire if the purpose of this corporation is not primarily to allow the industries of the country to conduct themselves through their banks by establishing the corporation, and it is only in exceptional cases that the corporation will deal with a public industry or enterprise directly?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly; that is the very point, Mr. President. The public utilities corporations said that they would not be adequately protected under the general provisions of the bill, which required that these loans should be primarily secured through the banks, and they came to the committee asking that they be put into a class by themselves and permitted to make direct application to the board for relief instead of being required, as the industries of the country are required under its provisions, to make their application first to the bank.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. REED. The Senator states that public utility companies appeared before the committee. How many public service companies appeared before the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. I could not tell how many were represented.

Mr. REED. Was there one out of a thousand?

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, the committee headed by Mr. Gadsden, who appeared before the Finance Committee, represented practically all the larger corporations of that kind in the country.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator will permit me, is it not a fact that delegates purporting to represent a very large number, if not a great proportion, of the public utilities of the country came before the committee?

Mr. SIMMONS. There were several gentlemen, I do not know how many. Mr. Gadsden and Mr. Crowell were the spokesmen befor the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Did not Mr. Crowell say he came officially there?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; they both said they came officially.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And spoke for the entire body of public utilities companies?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. REED. Is there any organization the membership of which is made up of public utilities of the country which embraces all public utilities?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will read to the Senator what Mr. Gadsden said in reference to his connection with the public utilities corporations of the country. He said:

I am chairman of a committee representing the four national public utility associations—the American Electric Railway Association, the National Electric Light Association, the American Gas Institute, and the National Commercial Gas Institute.

Mr. REED. The Senator knows as well as I do and as well as everybody else does that those associations are of that loose class that it is hard to tell whether they are social or financial or just what they are. They generally have a meeting about once a year at which a few gentlemen, for the most part some clerk in the office who can be spared, attend. They have some speeches and they go to a theater and are entertained and they go home. I undertake to say that not one of them is organized for the purpose of looking after legislation; that not one of them has any more authority to speak for their constituent members than I have to speak for them.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. REED. I am not mistaken. I know about it.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator makes a very broad statement. I do not desire to enter into any controversy with him about it. All I know is that these gentlemen came before the Finance Committee, as a committee, Mr. Gadsden being the chairman, appointed to represent these four different associations which comprise in the main the public utilities corporations of the country.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. SMITH of Michigan addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. For the information of the Senator from Missouri (Mr. REED) I wish to call attention to what Mr. Gadsden said in relation to this special committee. He states:

This committee has grown out of the critical situation which faces the public utilities of this country. It has been officially organized by the appointment from each association of representatives, so that we are officially representing, as far as it is possible for an industry to be represented, all of the electric railway, gas, and electric interests of the country. We have had a number of conferences before coming to Washington, extending over the last 60 days, in which conferences the leading men of the industry from all over the United States have taken part, in order to work out a common line of action and policy. This special committee of which I speak is composed of myself as chairman, and E. K. Hall, of the Electric Bond and Share Co., of New York, and Mr. H. H. Crowell, of the Commonwealth Co., of Grand Rapids, Mich.

Mr. REED. That sounds well, but it gets nowhere. I have attended meetings of the street railway associations, for instance. I know what they are. It is just the kind of organization I spoke of. They are a sort of social affair. They come together and they discuss the latest kind of a car. Somebody tells them of a new device to get an additional nickel, and somebody tells them of a new device for life-saving, and in that respect they are a very laudable concern. That is the general character of these organizations. Organizations put up in that way and for that purpose, of course, elect officers, and when those officers get together and conclude they want to have some legislation passed, they declare that they come down here officially, but they do not represent a body that is organized for the purpose of looking after legislation of this kind or advising Congress as to what is wanted by the constituent members.

I am speaking of this not because I want to indicate an opposition to the bill, but I have witnessed, at this session of Congress especially, time and again, that men appear here and tell us that they represent somebody, when as a matter of fact they represent only themselves. There are a good many thousand public utilities in the United States, and I say again that I question whether there has ever been a board of directors of a single public utilities in the United States which has passed on this legislation.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. KNOX. May I suggest that this does not affect public utilities in the slightest way, except as they want to avail themselves of the provisions of the bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is all.

Mr. KNOX. It is immaterial, it seems to me, whether or not these men represented the public utilities, if, in the wisdom of Congress, it is wise to leave the door open so that they may avail themselves of this legislation if the necessity arises.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think there can be any question in the mind of anybody who has given any study and investigation to this question, that the public utilities are deeply, I may say profoundly, interested in this legislation; that they look upon this legislation as essential to them and that without some such assistance by the Government they are riding for a fall and the time of that fall is not far distant.

I have no doubt, on the other hand, that the men who appeared before us were thoroughly accredited by the interests which they purported to represent, and that they spoke the sentiments and wishes of the associations they were delegated to represent.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina whether the committee have any data going to show the extent to which these power plants are devoting their energies to the manufacture of munitions of war?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think the power plants themselves, as a general rule, are manufacturing munitions of war. They are furnishing the power with which others manufacture such munitions.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They are furnishing the power to certain of the munition industries, are they not?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. The majority of industrial plants, I will say, who are to-day manufacturing the supplies which the Government requires, get their power from these plants.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. On the other hand, these power plants are unable to obtain any financial relief through the ordinary channels of commerce?

Mr. SIMMONS. They are unable to obtain new credits either from the banks or the general public. First. Because the Government's borrowings have largely preempted the investment money of the country. Second. Because the securities they can offer are ineligible for discount in the reserve banks, and because for reasons I will later discuss, their securities have suffered exceptional depreciation.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I rise to make this one point, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. As a consequence of the conditions which the Senator from North Carolina has just described, it has become necessary for the Government to advance large sums of money to the industrial corporations which are engaged in the making of munitions and supplies in one form and another, is it not?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And it is to avoid that situation and to create a corporate intermediary that the Senator has reported this bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator that the corporation which it is now proposed to establish is an instrumentality articulating with the Treasury and the Federal reserve bank, through which the Government can indirectly extend assistance to certain industries which it can not well extend directly through the Treasury.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to make a suggestion to the Senator, though he may have already met the point, in regard to these public utilities. It is to be remembered that they are all under State laws; that their rates are fixed——

Mr. SIMMONS. I was going into a discussion of that phase of the question, but the Senator's interruption is all right, and I will be glad to have the Senator make his statement.

Mr. LODGE. The rates of these public utilities are fixed; they can not raise their earnings as industrial corporations can in order to meet the increases in wages and materials. They stand in a class by themselves. I only want to say in regard to the official report which has been quoted here that a gentleman came from Boston, who represented a firm having connection with a very large number of public utility companies, they having financed them throughout the United States, and he told me that the views expressed by the committee which the Senator from Utah was reading were the views of the public utilities; that they had $225,000,000 which had to be renewed this year, and that if we could not help them to renew that sum it would bring a crash in the market and a business panic.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. In that connection, I think it will be very interesting for Senators to refer to the hearings, beginning on page

121. Senators will there find a list of public utility companies whose securities mature during the year 1918. Every company in the United States which has securities maturing during this coming year is named in that list, and the amount of the securities that become due, beginning with March 1 of this year, and down to and including the end of the year, it will be found is $233,000,000. Those are the maturing securities of public utilities, outside of the railroads, which fall due this present year.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the Senator from North Carolina allow me to interrupt him further?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] has just informed me that there is upward of $2,000,000,000 of indebtedness of public utility companies and power companies coming due this year.

Mr. KING. The amount is approximately $1,700,000,000, but that includes the maturing obligations of all railroads, of public utility corporations, of manufacturing plants, and foreign indebtedness.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Of course that would include railroad obligations. The point I want to make is this: By the creation of this corporation a new means by which to get Federal reserve money is opened to public service corporations, is it not?

Mr. SIMMONS. Not necessarily.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, ultimately it must come to that, or else it does not afford any relief. If it does come to that, I want to know from the Senator whether there is any plan afoot to strengthen the gold reserve and to maintain the parity of our Federal reserve notes? This question gives me some concern, because we have moved very rapidly in the conversion of bills into Federal reserve notes so that there is a strong likelihood that the Federal reserve notes will exceed two and a half billion dollars before the middle of this year is reached. If that is done, and this plan becomes law, the relationship between those notes and our gold reserves will be very seriously affected, and unless some plan is formed whereby this can be offset, it seems to me we are running into great danger of tremendous inflation through our Federal reserve system. Does the Senator have the right to say whether or not the officers of the Federal reserve board look with favor upon this proposed legislation?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; the governor of the Federal Reserve Board and Mr. Warburg, a member of that board, both of whom appeared before the Finance Committee, rejected the suggestion that this legislation would lead to either unsound expansion of credits or inflation of currency.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What do they call it? Do they call it by some other name?

Mr. SIMMONS. Inflation or expansion—you can take your choice.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, are we going to do that with perfect equanimity and unconcern?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator is unduly alarmed.

Mr SMITH of Michigan. I do not want the Senator to misunderstand me.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is anticipating me.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will desist, but I did not want the Senator to get a wrong impression from my inquiry. I really feel that something must be done to strengthen the credit and to afford relief to the public utilities companies, who are facing a very serious situation. I am quite in accord with the general purpose of the Senator, but the suggestion which I made a moment ago seriously affects my disposition toward this bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will permit me, I want to say generally right now—and I shall elaborate that a little later on—that this bill does not enlarge the powers of the Federal Reserve Board with reference to the issuance of Federal reserve notes. The only thing which the bill does is to create additional eligible paper for discount by the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Without changing the principle upon which the commercial transactions of the country have been proceeding since we passed the Federal reserve law. I do not want the merchants or manufacturers of this country to suffer any hardship.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator does not permit me to finish my statement. The only paper that is added by this bill to the paper eligible for rediscount by the Federal reserve banks is the bonds of the corporation which we propose to create. The bill simply proposes to authorize this corporation to issue a certain number of bonds, namely, not in excess of eight times its capital stock. Those bonds are made eligible for discount in the hands of member banks, but they are not otherwise made eligible

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They can not go direct to the Federal reserve banks?

Mr. SIMMONS. They can not go direct; they are made eligible for rediscount in the Federal reserve banks, and in that respect placed upon a parity with the Liberty bonds. That is all the bill does in this respect. The Liberty bonds are now eligible for discount by the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But not by the purchaser directly.

Mr. SIMMONS. The bonds of the proposed corporation will not be eligible for rediscount by the purchaser directly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am glad to be informed as to that.

Mr. SIMMONS. No purchaser of these bonds can go to the Federal reserve bank and secure their discount or secure notes upon them. If any of the paper authorized by this act is to be discounted by the Federal reserve bank, or if Federal reserve notes are to be issued upon it, it must come to those banks through a member bank and with an indorsement showing that it is collateral security for the note of that bank; and it must be ninety-day paper; in other words, the only way in which the bonds of this corporation connect at all with the loaning or the issuing powers of the Federal reserve bank, is just exactly as commercial paper connects with them. No commercial paper can be discounted directly with the Federal reserve bank; the Federal reserve bank can not issue notes upon commercial paper, but the commercial paper must come to them as collateral security for the notes of a member bank. So these bonds must come to the Federal reserve bank as collateral security for the paper of the member bank, and, coming to it in that way, the Federal reserve bank may either rediscount them or it may issue Federal reserve notes against them. That is my understanding of the matter.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. There is a limitation of $2,500,000,000 on the amount of currency that may be issued by the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will come to that. What I meant to say was this, that in view of the fact that this bill simply makes the bonds of this corporation eligible as security for member banks for rediscount, and in view of the further fact that that is a privilege extended to every Liberty bond that we have issued——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And, Mr. President, let me suggest on this question that there is a special provision in the bill putting the issue under the control of the Federal reserve bank, and they can put a special tax on the currency that may be issued.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. As I was about to say when interrupted, the thing this bill does is to put the bonds of this corporation upon a parity with Liberty bonds and upon a parity with commercial paper for purposes of rediscount by the reserve bank and as a basis of reserve notes.

Now, what has happened in reference to Liberty bonds? We have issued up to this time, I believe, something over $6,000,000,000 of Liberty bonds. These bond constitute what is known as eligible paper. Of the $6,000,000,000 of Liberty bonds, $300,000,000 have found their way into the Federal reserve banks for rediscount or note issue.

Mr. President, of course we have already a great expansion of credits in this country. We can not carry on the big operations of this Government, we can not put into effect the different agencies that have had to be called into existence to supply the abnormal demands of the country at this time, not only for ourselves but for our allies, without producing an inflation of credits. That is an absolutely inevitable incident to the conditions in which we are living and working. There is an expanded credit in this country and there will be, as we go on in this business, a still larger expansion of credits. It is necessary, it is healthy, it is sound. The members of the Federal Reserve Board expressed the opinion that, while there was expansion of credits and would have to be a still greater expansion of credits, yet there was not, up to this time, any unhealthy expansion.

The question of the expansion of currency is a different question. Of course, if we abnormally expand our credits, we have got to some extent expand our circulating medium, and undoubtedly it has been to some extent expanded, but not to an unhealthy extent, not to an abnormal extent. It will have to be further expanded; but, Mr. President, there are ample safeguards, not only in the provisions of this bill itself but in the provisions of the law under which this additional currency is issued. In the first place, this bill provides that the Federal Reserve Board may require a higher rate of interest on loans made upon the security of the bonds of this corporation. That is one brake. Secondly, it provides that the Federal Reserve Board may impose a special rate of interest upon currency issued against these bonds, just as the Aldrich-Vreeland Act provided for a special tax. In this case there is merely a difference in phraseology. Whenever, in the judgment of the board, which we have made the custodian of our note issue with the power and the duty to protect it against undue inflation, they see fit to exercise the power, they can do it by prescribing what is, in essence, a tax in the form of interest upon notes issued against this security.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will withhold his interruption for a few moments, then I will yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. Very well.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is one of the brakes—a high rate of interest.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Higher than the commercial rate?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; they make the rate of interest on loans secured by these bonds and on notes issued against them higher than the commercial rate, nigher than the ordinary rates fixed for 90-day paper, that is a currency regulation as was the tax imposed in the Vreeland-Aldridge Act.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is about 5½ per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. They can make it more, if they see fit, to accomplish the object sought. Secondly, they can impose this special tax; but that is not all; in addition to that every dollar of currency issued by the Federal Reserve Board must be covered by a gold cover of 40 per cent.

That applies to the issues under the present law, and that applies equally to any issue that may be made under this bill. So that the amount of Federal reserve notes that may be at any time issued, either under the present law or under this bill if it shall become a law, will be protected by the requirement that it must be covered by at least 40 per cent of gold reserve held by the banks. That safeguard has been sufficient to protect us against inflation. That safeguard has enabled the Reserve Board to place a limitation upon notes issued against Liberty bonds, and it will be a sufficient safeguard against inflation through the issuance of notes against the obligations of this corporation.

Now, Mr. President, let me come back to the general situation.

The real reason why this legislation is necessary at this time grows out of several conditions connected with our business and financial situation. It is due in part to the fact that the Government must have an enormous amount of ready cash, not only to meet its own expenses but to finance our allies. In order to get this money it has been compelled to go into the markets and sell its securities; with the result it has to a considerable degree preempted the securities market of the country. It is further due in part to the naturally timidity of the ordinary investor on account of the uncertainties brought about by war conditions. I think that is very largely a psychological condition, but it is a condition that always accompanies a situation such as we now find ourselves in. The general investor hesitates, and, if he invests at all, invests in the very highest class of securities, generally Government bonds, State bonds, municipal bonds, and bonds of that character.

A third trouble is the one I have been discussing. In the present conditions banks hesitate to give credit unless they can, in case it becomes necessary, rediscount the security taken; that is, pass them on; and generally they resort for this purpose to the Federal reserve banks. There are to-day but few banks which do not find it necessary to rediscount the paper which they themselves discount.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. A lot of them would live if they supplied the ordinary demands; but they can not supply the extraordinary demands.

Mr. SIMMONS. They can not do it now. They can only partially supply the present demands by rediscounting their loans, so to speak, and for that reason they are discriminating in favor of paper which is eligible for rediscount by the reserve banks.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, Mr. President, I think the Senator is wrong about that. There are many banks that have not rediscounted at all, and do not make it a practice, and never have.

Mr. SIMMONS. In my part of the country for the last several years the banks have been making a practice of rediscounting very largely the paper which they take from their customers. The limitation which the present law places upon the powers of the Federal reserve bank does not permit a member bank which has made a loan to pass up that loan to the Federal reserve bank unless the loan is secured by commercial or agricultural paper or by United States bonds not entitled to the circulation privilege; so that by reason of that fact, if these member banks shall loan money to these industrial corporations and to these public utilities and to the railroads and take their long-term securities, under the present law they can not use those securities as collateral to get money from the Federal reserve bank; and because of that situation it was made to appear clearly to your committee that the banks have for some time practically ceased making loans upon commercial and agricultural paper and Government bonds, leaving the great corporations of the country, leaving the great industries that are manufacturing the things that this Government must have with which to win the war, leaving the railroads and the public utilities, without adequate means of securing advances upon such securities as they are able to offer.

Now we come back to the public utility corporations. These gentlemen came before us and they said: "We have $235,000,000 of maturing obligations. They must be met in the next six or seven weeks. If we can not meet them, we must go out of business. We can not get this money from the banks." Why can they not get it? First, because their securities are not such as the banks are willing to deal in at this time. Secondly, because of the fact that their rates are prescribed by the local commissions where they operate, and can not be advanced to offset the enormous increase in operating expenses. So that while the price of labor they must employ has enormously increased, while the price of new construction and maintenance has likewise enormously increased, their rates remain stationary.

For these reasons and for the further reasons that the paper they can offer for collateral is ineligible for rediscount the banks and the investment public refuse to accommodate them.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to his colleague?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. Suppose in the case of a public utility company having bonds falling due this year, the cost of the entire plant was $100,000, and they had issued bonds to the amount of $200,000. Is the Government's interest thoroughly protected in this bill against the issue of $200,000?

Mr. SIMMONS. Just as thoroughly protected as it would be protected if they were to go to a bank to borrow money.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, let me add to that just one more suggestion. Suppose their charter is expiring, and, under the present drift of public opinion or governmental action, Government control becomes a dominating feature, and they can not get a renewal of their charter: What are you going to do with a concern like that? Are they to have no rights, or are you to favor them? And if you do favor them——

Mr. SIMMONS. In this bill we have left to this board the matter of advancing money to these corporations.

Mr. OVERMAN. Do they get the money through the banks, or directly from the board?

Mr. SIMMONS In the case of a public utility, they can come directly to the corporation and borrow money.

Mr. OVERMAN. For example, the American Telephone Exchange Co. have $50,000,000 of securities coming due this year. Would they come directly to the board, or would they get the money from the bank?

Mr. SIMMONS. They can borrow from the bank or they can go in the first instance to the corporation and borrow.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator mean they can go to the member bank?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, they can go to any member bank for it and if refused they can go directly to the corporation created by this act or they can apply in the first instance to the corporation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will my friend yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. KING. I have examined this bill with a great deal of care, and have read all of the testimony; and while, if I may be permitted to say so, the bill is a great shock to the views of many who have regarded the activity of the Government along banking lines as being entirely outside of its function, yet it seems to me that a measure of the general character of this bill is required. But what I arose to say was that the only criticism of the bill that I care to express now arises out of the feature that the Senator is now discussing; namely, that public utility corporations may address themselves directly to this corporation—that is, to the Government—and obtain a loan from it without going through some other bank.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. The corporation not the Government.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think that it is rather a dangerous thing to permit the Government to deal directly with corporations, even though they may have the standing of a public-utility corporation? Was there not some other method by which some intermediary could have been provided between the corporation and the Government corporation created by this bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator that it was made clear to the committee that these utility corporations could not, under present conditions, secure money for capital requirements through the banks, and that if they could not secure it through this corporation they could not secure it at all. Now, the Senator will please direct his attention to the provision that limits loans to such of these public utilities whose operations are necessary or contribute to the prosecution of the war.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. I notice subdivision "(d)," on page 9, which provides that this corporation may loan directly—to any firm, corporation, or association conducting an established and going business whose operations are necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war.

Now, is it not a fact that that permits this corporation to loan to any company in the United States, because every company contributes to some degree to the war? Was it intended that it should be limited to those having direct contract relations or furnishing something to the Government?

Mr. SIMMONS. Quite clearly, the language shows that it was intended to be confined to those things having direct relation to supply the Government with the things it needs.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is not the opinion of the Treasury Department, as I am told. They understand that this corporation may loan to all kinds of street railways and suburban railways, whether they have any contractual relations with the Government or not.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have heard no such opinion as that expressed. What is the section?

Mr. KELLOGG. Subdivision "(d)," the one that the Senator from North Carolina is talking about, on page 9.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what was known as the exceptional case. They can not make loans indiscriminately under that section if the concern is engaged in war work.

Mr. KELLOGG. But who decides the exceptional case? I take it that under that the board may loan to any company in the United States engaged in public service or private business. Now I should like to know why——

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, now, let us see:

(d) To make advances directly (1) to any corporation owning or controlling (directly or through stock ownership) any railroad or other public utility, and (2) to any firm, corporation, or association conducting an established and going business whose operations are necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war: Provided, That such advances shall be made only in such cases as the board of directors in their discretion shall determine to be of exceptional importance in the public interest.

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; but the board decides the importance in the public interest.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. KELLOGG. And it is a notorious fact that these concerns here seeking assistance are in no way connected with any Government work, and it is a notorious fact also that they are many of them what you might call the loosest financially.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not think under this bill advances can be made, unless the operations are connected with the war or contributory to it. They are permitted to make these advances where it appears to be important that it should be done in the public interest—not the private interest of the corporation, but the public interest.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, may I suggest further to the Senator from North Carolina that in the cases referred to by the Senator from Minnesota—namely, the suburban or electric lines—it probably would be very difficult to find a case that would come to this corporation for relief that was not in some way, directly or indirectly, connected with the war. All of these corporations furnish power, light, and transportation to men and institutions absolutely necessary to the war.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think that statement is absolutely true in the main.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then it is a fact, as I understand the Senator, that the board decides, and the board may hold that any corporation is contributing to the prosecution of the war, and its decision is final.

Mr. SIMMONS. If it is an established and going concern, and the board shall hold that it is exceptionally important in the public interest, then it may make advances.

Mr. KELLOGG. Now, I do not say that it is not necessary, but I think it should receive the careful attention of the Senator and the Senate. No other country has found it necessary to go into private financing; and whenever the public takes hold of financing, private financing is at an end. Furthermore, it is a notorious fact that the worst over-capitalized balloon concerns in this country are the public-service corporations.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is right.

Mr. KELLOGG. I mean, outside of the railroads.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator must bear in mind that they do not loan upon the stocks of corporations. There is not a single line in this bill that authorizes any advances to be made by this corporation upon stocks, the things that have been inflated. The advances can only be made upon the securities of these corporations, the bonds; and, of course, the board in one case and the banks in the other will be the judge of whether these securities are adequate to protect the amount of money loaned.

Mr. President, I do not wish to take up much more of the time of the Senate; but I think I had better not conclude before I allude to the situation of the savings banks.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, before the Senator passes to that branch of the subject permit me to say that I was not quite clear about his answer to his colleague [Mr. OVERMAN] with regard to the issue of bonds. Do I understand that the mere fact that there is an issue of bonds outstanding will justify this corporation in dealing directly with that corporation and taking care of that issue, without any regard to the circumstances under which the bonds were issued, the amount of actual value that they represent, the amount for which they were sold, whether at a very great discount or not, or are all those matters to be taken into consideration by the board?

Mr. SIMMONS. Such circumstances as a bank would take into consideration in loaning money to a customer, I understand, will be taken into consideration by this corporation in making these loans.

Mr. KNOX. If that is so—and I assume, of course, that it must be so—it is only by implication that it is so. There is no direct provision in this bill that those matters shall be taken into consideration.

Mr. SIMMONS. No.

Mr. KNOX. And it might be argued that there was an implication quite the other way, from this fact. It is suggested that certain things shall be taken into consideration as the basis for the loan; namely, the public interest.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. KNOX. Now, to express one thing is to exclude all others, as the Senator knows as a lawyer; and it might be possible that it would be urged that notwithstanding defects in the issuance of these bonds, notwithstanding that they may have been sold for sixty or seventy or eighty cents on the dollar and that the holders of the bonds had not paid full value for them, yet there was such a public interest in carrying on this railroad that the corporation should loan the money.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think the legal intendment would lead to the conclusion that the corporation would be authorized to make a loan not properly safeguarded with security. I think the requirement as to the public interest is a limitation upon the power to loan to such a concern at all.

Mr. KNOX. There are so many and such ample safeguards in protection of this corporation in respect to the dealings through the banks that it seems to me they could not be improved upon, because in the first place when the loan gets up to the corporation it has the credit of the bank and the credit of the borrower and the value of the securities, and then the amount can be only 75 per cent; but when you come to dealing with these public utilities there seems to be a paucity of provision in that particular that to my mind stands out in very striking contrast.

Mr. SIMMONS. As the case is to be an exceptional case, I think it was the thought of the Secretary and the thought of the committee that we would have to trust to the corporation, representing the Government as it does, dealing with Government money, to see that the advances made were properly secured. If the case is to be exceptional, you could not very well specify the character of security to be taken. It should be ample, but it would be necessary in such cases to invest large discretion in the board of directors.

Mr. KNOX. What is the Senator's own idea of the form that a transaction of that kind might take? Take the citation of his colleague (Mr. OVERMAN): Suppose a public-utility corporation has a $200,000 bond issue maturing within the next 60 days. It takes those bonds to this corporation, because it comes within the class that may deal directly with the corporation, and says: "These bonds have matured, and we want to borrow $200,000, and we want to redeem these bonds. We have to redeem them." Now, they can not borrow, or at least they should not be able to borrow, $200,000 if they are worth only $100,000; and $100,000 would not redeem them, and the bankruptcy and receivership we are seeking to avert would not be averted. There is nothing here to show that the loan would be limited to the market value or to any value that might be determined by the amount that had been paid with relation to the physical property of the corporation or any one of those factors that go to determine the value of securities.

Mr. SIMMONS. But the Senator must not overlook the fact that the corporation may issue bonds for a larger amount than was necessary for meeting the maturity. And these bonds would be good security to the extent of the property behind them.

Mr. KNOX. There would have to be value back of them.

Mr. SIMMONS. There would have to be value back of them, of course, or they should not get the money.

Mr. KNOX. I will not anticipate for one moment that any power conferred under this bill is going to be consciously abused by the directors of the corporation. I am one of those who do not withhold my consent to legislation because I fear the powers conferred may be abused, because if you did you would never get anywhere. All human institutions depend upon personal credit and personal honor. But this is the only point I desire to make. I can see how a case of this kind may be honestly urged upon the board. I do not want to see a $200,000 issue which represents $100,000 of value pressed upon this board, because it is their duty to lend if there is a public interest or it may so happen that a crippled and overcapitalized institution may for the time being stand in a position where it is extremely valuable to the public.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator that the committee was not satisfied with this section (see 7) in the bill as orginally written, and sought to improve it by practically rewriting it. They thought there might be cases in which the public interest required the Government to lend its aid, which would not come under the general provisions of the bill, and that we could trust to the directors of the corporation to properly protect the Government.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that I sought to cure the difficulty which he has suggested by an amendment in the committee requiring this corporation to demand the same security as to amount and value as is required by the preceding subsections of the bill, but it was rejected by the committee.

Mr. KNOX. What was the objection to that, if I may be permitted to inquire?

Mr. THOMAS. The objection to it was in substance, as I recall it, that it was exacting too great security for that particular class of exceptional cases.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish also to state to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] that I tried to obviate what I considered a loose method in this paragraph by requiring that the loan should never exceed the market value of the security offered. That was disagreed to by the committee. I will state to the Senator the reason for it.

There are a few public utility corporations in the United States that are actually vital to the manufacture of munitions of war and for the successful operation of the war, and there are a few of those institutions that if they were required to put up this security to-day, more than the securities they have upon the bonds issued that will mature in a short time, it would be impossible for them to do so. In other words, it was shown that they are losing money to-day. They are hardly making enough money under the prices that have been fixed by the utility commissions of the States in which they are located to pay the running expenses and pay interest upon the bonds.

I do not want to evade the question, but I think whenever an issue is to be made we ought to meet it squarely. I believe that under paragraph (d) of section 6 of the bill there will be some loans made to public utility corporations of the country that will not be secured. I say that frankly, but I do not think there will be many of them. However, I believe that the case will be presented to the board in such a way that the board will actually feel that for the public interest and for the maintenance of the full production of munitions of war that are absolutely necessary it will be best for the Government to take the chances.

I wish to make just one other suggestion and then I will cease. There was a feeling also, and there is a feeling in the Treasury Department, that the prices the public utility corporations of the country are allowed to charge for their service is too low, taking into consideration the cost of everything that goes into the maintenance and operation of the plants. They feel that there ought to be given time for these public utility corporations to appeal to the commissions of their States and ask them to allow an increase for the service rendered.

I am quite sure, Mr. President, that the Secretary of the Treasury must feel that in most of these cases that request ought to be granted, for I think there are 90 per cent of the public utility corporations of the United States to-day that are serving the public, notwithstanding the wonderful increase in the cost of maintenance and operation, and are only charging what they were charging years before the war began. I want to say frankly that that was taken into consideration in drawing this paragraph (d). The Senator from North Carolina, I am quite sure, will not object if I simply at this time correct a statement made by him, as I understood it, that this corporation could only lend to these public utilities upon their property.

Mr SIMMONS. No, I did not say that.

Mr. SMOOT. I was told the Senator said that, but if he did not say it I have nothing further to say.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As I came into the room reference was made to the proviso at the close of page 9. I had been called out for a moment. What I am about to say may have already been stated. Still I wish that it should be in the RECORD. This proviso has no reference to the security. It is provided:

> That such advances shall be made only in such cases as the board of directors in their discretion shall determine to be of exceptional importance in the public interest.

It has no reference to the security at all. It is intended as words of limitation without reference to the security. No matter how good the security, these transactions can not be made direct by this corporation except where the case is of exceptional importance and in the public interest. I do not think the board would be justified at all in saying we will waive the question of good security on account of the importance to the public interest. They are only permitted to loan at all except through the banks in exceptional cases in the public interest. Then—

> Such advances may be made for periods not exceeding five years from the passage of this act, upon such terms and upon such security and subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed—

And so forth.

I only wanted during the discussion of the subject to clearly express my opinion that that language is no excuse for a loan on poor security.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator venture an opinion as to whether, so far as this bill affects advances to public service corporations—that is, street railroads—it really might be termed a bill to protect public service corporations against the persistent refusal of local regulatory commissions in raising rates?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know that I would say that was the case. I can state what influenced me with reference to it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I say if the State commissions in many instances would permit the raising of the rate it probably would not be necessary for these public utility corporations to come to the Government for help?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Even then I think this provision should be in the bill. We are desiring to occupy almost exclusively the bond market in the sale of our Liberty bonds. We do not desire these public service companies to have a bond so attractive as to cause it to interfere in any way with the sale of Liberty bonds.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator does not think the public service companies are in a position now to offer a bond that is very attractive?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I know companies that could make their bonds quite attractive if the rate was high enough. An 8 per cent bond on a good public service company ought to be quite an attractive investment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. What would be back of the bonds to guarantee the payment of 8 per cent interest?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The property itself. I speak of a paying concern.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Very few of them are paying concerns. That is the whole point in this bill, as I understand it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. They may not be making money just now, but as a permanent investment nothing is better than public service property. They have proved the most lucrative in the country, and I have not any question but that they will do so again.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Senator from Georgia is entirely right because I know of some companies whose bonds are now out in a considerable sum, half a million dollars or more, at 4 per cent, and if the Government sell at 4 per cent of course it would very much impair the ability to renew its maturing loans.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I felt that they ought not to be forced to go into the market also to sell their bonds now as against our Liberty bonds, and generally the theory was that they were a class of industries that the Government could well aid in financing their affairs during the present unusual and abnormal conditions.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the Senator will yield to me for a moment, I take it the principal criticism of this provision is that it does not provide for the corporations taking adequate security. I can see no objection at all to inserting the words that it shall be required to take adequate security, because there was no request on the part of any of the utility men that they should be exempt from the provision which requires adequate security. But there might be a question as to the propriety of stating just exactly the same proportion of security that would be offered as in other cases for the very excellent reasons that have been given by the Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from Georgia. These bonds have been artificially affected by the Government itself, State and local. They have put restrictions not only on the money market which has shut it out from these concerns but the local authorities have put restrictions upon their earning power. I do not think any man could conceive of a public interest being served by the destruction of any one of these going concerns that is prosperous in time of peace.

As I suggested a moment ago to the Senator from North Carolina, if Senators on the floor believe that this provision is defective in that it does not require the corporation to take adequate security there can be no possible objection to putting it in because the Secretary of the Treasury said it would be required and the representatives of these concerns said they were ready to offer such security as they would require. If that would relieve the situation those words could be inserted without any difficulty.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I recall quite well in considering the subject that we doubted the wisdom of referring to the market value of the security, because the board might well feel that the market value of the securities was not equal to the real value, and might regard certain securities of a public utilities company adequate although their market value might not meet the amount loaned, treating the subject as one where the use of securities to liquidate the debt would not take place at once.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, undoubtedly the committee and the Secretary of the Treasury felt that in making these exceptional cases the same rigid rule of determining the amount to be advanced upon a given security should not be applied, because if applied it would probably defeat the very purpose of the Government in coming to the relief of these corporations. It was thought also that some latitude, some exercise of discretion, should be allowed with reference to the securities they would demand in this class of cases, assuming, of course, that the board would not loan upon manifestly inadequate securities and assuming, of course, that the board would protect the interest of the Government; but if the interest of the Government in continuing the corporation as a going concern was great and it was necessary for the Government to take some little chances then those chances might be taken.

The situation it seems to me makes that the wise course to pursue. This class of securities is at present depressed. The value behind those securities is probably as great, if not greater, now as it was when the securities were at a higher price. The condition which has depressed them is one for which the Government—either the National Government or the State government—is responsible. Those conditions will obtain only temporarily, it is believed. They would probably not exist but for the inability of these concerns to advance their rates. If the movement now going on all over the country to induce local commissions to permit an advance in rates is successful the trouble will be largely overcome. Only this morning the papers announced that the President had written a letter, I believe, to the Secretary of the Treasury, in which he strongly urged upon the corporation commissions of the States the wisdom and the justice of allowing advances in these rates to meet the greatly increased cost of operation.

If that is done, the securities temporarily depressed will be advanced to normal value based on the property value behind them.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, that does not meet the situation described by the Senator from Georgia, who very frankly says that the purpose of this measure is that the field may be vacated——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I said that was one of the reasons.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I thought the Senator said that was the reason.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No, I gave that as one of the reasons.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I thought the Senator said that was the reason; that the purpose was to avoid any attempt to market the securities in the open market, and thus deprive the Government of the possession of that market for its own securities.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I said that was one of the reasons.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think the Senator from Georgia meant that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I said that was one of the reasons.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I thought it was a very frank statement; and perhaps it may be a good reason.

Mr. SIMMONS. That was the reason for the licensing clause, which appears in the bill, but not for this provision.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I suggest to the Senator, for his consideration afterwards, in view of what the Senator from Pennsylvania said, namely, that the board might feel itself practically bound to grant these loans to the concerns mentioned, what objection would there be to inserting after the words "make advances," the words "upon adequate security," because I think the record will disclose that all the parties interested in this particular clause were agreed that the loan should be made only upon adequate security? Of course, the corporation must determine what "adequate security" is, but the insertion of the three words which I have suggested will make it clear that they must be required to take security, which they would do in any event.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, my conception of the purpose was to give the board of directors the right to go somewhat behind the market values and to base their loans upon the value of the assets behind the security.

Mr. TOWNSEND. My suggestion would not prevent that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Upon the market value.

Mr. SIMMONS. Not upon the market value, but the value of the assets behind those bonds.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not the market value of the bonds, but their actual value.

Mr. SIMMONS. Their actual value, yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The suggestion I have made will not alter that situation. It will permit that to be done.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me for a moment, it seems to me that when we discuss "adequate security," it simply means that we must rely on the discretion of the board; and that really is the meat of the whole question. If the board is efficient and its judgment is wise, then there is no danger; while if the board is inefficient and its judgment is unwise, then, I think, the whole provision of the bill is bound to fall down. It is really a question of the board.

Mr. SIMMONS. The use of that language does not affect the discretion of the board. The board would have the discretion to pass upon the adequacy of the security offered. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is worthy of consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is worthy of very serious consideration.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, there are other features of this bill which I have not discussed, especially those relating to savings banks and those relating to the granting of licenses. It is late in the afternoon, and it has been brought to my attention that, for reasons not necessary to be now stated, certain Senators on this side of the Chamber desire to leave the Chamber at about half-past 5 o'clock. I think I will discontinue my remarks now, and I may renew them in the morning or I may wait until the sections in the bill that I have not discussed this afternoon are reached, when we take the bill up for consideration and amendment and discuss them at that time. I will not, at any rate, continue my remarks further this afternoon.

Thursday, February 28, 1918.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, when I discontinued my remarks upon the pending bill on a previous day I gave notice that I would resume at some early period in the consideration of the bill. I was discussing at the time I suspended the section of the bill which relates to advances to public utilities and railroad corporations.

I am afraid, Mr. President, that there is some misunderstanding in the minds of some Senators with reference to the conditions and circumstances under which the finance corporation created by the bill may be permitted to make advances to the class of corporations embraced in this section of the bill.

It is true that so far as the privilege of making a direct application to the corporation for these advances is concerned, there is a differentiation in this behalf of this class of corporations from industrial and business corporations engaged in other lines of business. These other corporations apply through the intervention of the banks. Public utilities and railroads are permitted under this section to apply directly to the corporation.

I have heretofore discussed the reasons for that differentiation and I need not go into it now, but, Mr. President, while these utility corporations and certain other corporations may go directly to the finance corporation they must be engaged directly or indirectly in war work; that is to say, the bill expressly provides, and I am afraid it has not been sufficiently impressed upon Senators, that in order to procure advances from the corporation the money must be asked by a corporation whose operations directly or indirectly contribute to the war.

I think the impression prevails that these corporations may without reference to the relation of their operation to the war requirement of the Government obtain advances from this corporation. That is not true. They can not, as a rule, get advances unless the loan is for the purpose of aiding a concern whose operations are of assistance to the Government in the prosecution of the war directly or indirectly.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I noticed in the discussion held the other day at a time when I was unavoidably absent from the Chamber the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] made the observation that every broken-down public utility would be coming to this corporation for relief. The Senator distinctly recalls the fact, as do I, that that was discussed very thoroughly in the committee and that both the Secretary of the Treasury and Mr. Warburg of the Federal Reserve Board stated to the committee that they would exercise the greatest possible care and not advance anything in aid of utilities that were not in some way connected with the war, and that broken-down public utilities that were not in any way connected with war operations would certainly not get a very cordial hearing from the corporation.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator, I think, is entirely right in his statement with reference to the representations made to the committee.

But, Mr. President, so far from these corporations enjoying with respect to the matter that I have just been discussing an advantage over the industrial corporations under the proviso of the bill they are not likely to be able to secure as liberal consideration from the corporation as the industries. This is intended clearly as the proviso shows to meet an exceptional case. It is not intended, I think, and I think the Secretary of the Treasury made it very clear in his testimony, that the finance corporation shall come to the rescue of these utility concerns if they can secure the capital needed to keep them going from the banks or through other investment channels. It is only when they are unable through the ordinary channels to secure credit that they may come to the corporation and get help. The limitation imposed upon the finance corporation in this particular case not only confines it to advances to concerns whose operations are in aid of the war, but it further restricts these advances to—such cases as the board of directors in their discretion shall determine to be of exceptional importance in the public interest; exceptional importance to the public interest, not the private interest of the corporation.

So, notwithstanding they may be engaged in war work when they come and make application, the board is not permitted to loan them a dollar, as it would in the case of an industry, until it has investigated, ascertained, and determined that the advance ought to be made in the interest of the public and decided that it is a case of exceptional importance in the public interest. It will then do so unless the application can not secure the requisite advance from ordinary business sources.

Mr. President, only a few days ago we passed through the Senate what is known as the railroad control bill validating and legalizing the action of the President in taking over the railroads. Why did we take over the railroads? Everybody knows that the Executive and Congress were moved to the very extraordinary action by the fact that the railroads, largely because of their financial troubles, were unable to adequately meet the extraordinary demands upon them, and were approaching a condition of collapse and breakdown. It was to save them and protect the public interests against a disaster that they were taken over by the Government.

When we proceeded to legislate with regard to the action of the President in that particular, the very first thing we did in recognition of the fact that I have stated was to appropriate $500,000,000 out of the Treasury, put it in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, and authorized him to use it in such way as his judgment and that of his associates might dictate to assist the railroads in obtaining the necessary relief from the financial dilemmas and difficulties in which they had become involved and put their properties in condition to meet the demands made upon them by the public and the Government. Five hundred million dollars is a large sum of money, but the Director General recognizes the fact that it may not be sufficient, that it may be necessary for the Government to furnish additional money to rescue these corporations from financial wreck, and to meet this contingency railroad corporations are included in this section of the bill.

The public utility corporations of the country are in identically the same situation with reference to financing themselves and their operations as are the railroads. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] has alluded to the fact that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] stated that this legislation was sought by the broken-down public utilities of the country. Mr. President, no broken-down concerns have appeared before the committee. If any such concerns have been hanging around this Capitol, I have not heard of it. I know, and I think it is pretty generally known, that the public utility corporations of the country are in a desperate condition, and unless they can obtain some relief through the Government, which it is impossible for them to get through the ordinary business and financial channels in the flotation of their securities and the advancement of capital for capital expenditures and to liquidate maturing obligation, they are riding to a certain fall.

Mr. SMOOT. And that applies to the prosperous corporations as well as to the others.

Mr. SIMMONS. It applies to the prosperous as well as to those who are already crippled. In normal times these companies were generally prosperous; the great power corporations of the country were among our most prosperous industries before the war, and they are so yet, but they are in as much trouble, especially as to their approaching maturities, as are the crippled concerns to which the Senator from Minnesota alluded.

Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that, so far as obtaining adequate security for advances made to these corporations is concerned, I think we may as safely trust the Secretary of the Treasury and the four directors of this concern to protect the interests of the Government as we have trusted him to disburse the $500,000,000 which was appropriated for the railroads and put into his hands.

I think again, Mr. President, that there is some misapprehension with reference to the advances the finance corporation is authorized to make under the bill. If the application comes from an industrial corporation it would come through a bank. Such bank must have made advances to the corporation, and the advances which it has made must have been for war purposes. It is entirely erroneous to suppose that these banks can come to the corporation with any sort of security. It must appear in the application that the bank applying for advances has made like advances to some industry which is serving the Government in this emergency. The bank must give its own promissory note, secured by the collateral which are the bases of such advances by the corporation.

Mr. President, enough about that. I want now to refer very briefly to the only case in the bill where advances may be made by this corporation for other than war purposes; it is the case of the savings banks. The savings bank invests the money of its depositors in miscellaneous securities. Sometimes it may help a war industry, but its securities as a general thing are not of that character, and its investments are not for that purpose. In fact, I do not suppose those banks are making any large investments just at this time of that kind. The most of their securities probably are securities that were accumulated before the war began, or at least before our scheme of preparation for war was actively begun on a large scale. Anyway, much of the paper they hold is not eligible security under the general provisions of the act, because it has not been as a rule given for advances for war purposes.

The savings banks in many States outnumber other kinds of banks, while in a number of States they probably have deposits larger than all other banks put together, deposits made up very largely from the savings and the earnings of the poor people, and particularly the working classes.

These banks and their depositors have been very large purchasers of Liberty bonds, and, if the rate of interest on these bonds shall be raised in the coming issue there will be an additional inducement to these depositors to purchase these bonds.

These savings banks invest the money of their depositors in long-term securities. When withdrawals exceed deposits these banks have to sell securities, and in the present condition of the securities these sales could only be made at a great sacrifice.

Mr. President, in these conditions it is important to the whole financial and industrial fabric of this Government that these banks should be able to secure ready cash to meet their obligations to their depositors without having to sacrifice their securities. So, Mr. President, we included the saving banks in this provision, permitting them to go directly to the proposed corporation and permitting the corporation, when it shall find that it is to the public interest to do so, to make advances to them upon their securities without regard to whether or not they represent advances to concerns whose operations were necessary or contributory to the war.

There is one other provision of the bill, Mr. President, to which I think I ought to allude before I conclude this statement, which has been intended by me largely to try to get before the Senators the provisions of the bill and the reasons assigned by the sponsors of the measure for those provisions. It is well known—I have explained it and there has been no concealment about it—that this is an Administration measure. It comes from the Treasury Department; it has no special sponsor upon this floor; it is as much one Senator's bill as it is another Senator's bill, and, therefore, in justice to the Secretary of the Treasury that the reasons given by him and those who collaborated with him in its initiation and preparation, should be presented to the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will venture to assume that the Senator from North Carolina would not ask anything more of the Senate in considering this bill than the consideration that was given to it by the committee, on the part of the majority and on the part of the minority.

Mr. SIMMONS. Absolutely nothing more than that; but we had the views of the sponsors of this legislation, who came before us and gave us their reasons for it; and I wanted to have the Senate put in possession of the reasons given us by them.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator was entirely right in doing that. The committee, certainly the minority of the committee—I speak more for myself than for my associates—listened with a great deal of interest to the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Warburg and Mr. Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board, recognizing the fact that they were the men best qualified to know what the urgent and absolute necessities of the Government are at the present time in reference to legislation of this nature.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish every Senator here who has the slightest doubt about this bill would read the testimony of the several witnesses who came before us. I want to say this about them: I do not believe there has ever before been a hearing before a congressional committee, in either House of Congress, where practically every man who appeared to give testimony was a master of the subject which he discussed.

Just one other matter, Mr. President, and then I shall be through. The only other important matter to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate is the provision with reference to licensing, and I shall be very brief about that.

It has been said, and truthfully said, that the duty of this hour, both as it applies to every loyal citizen of this country and to the Government, is to win the war. In order that we may accomplish that great purpose it is admittedly necessary that we should mobilize and conserve capital, labor, and materials—not a part, but we should conserve the whole of it, to the extent that the whole is needed. If all the capital of this country is needed, if all the labor of this country is needed, and all the materials of this country are needed, in order that this Government may prepare itself adequately and sufficiently to successfully wage and terminate the conflict in which we are engaged, then all of it should be conserved and mobilized. Certainly as much of it as is necessary should be conserved and mobilized to that one end.

Mr. President, under those conditions the Secretary of the Treasury and these two distinguished members of the Federal Reserve Board, who appeared before your committee, said that it had become apparent some time ago that in order to secure the necessary finances, even with the ancillary legislation either enacted or contemplated, it was necessary that the Government should exercise a wise but at the same time a plenary supervision over the capital expenditures of the country, to the end that it might curtail and stop the investment of capital and the expenditure of labor and materials in doing things that are unnecessary to be done in this emergency. England started out with the idea—and the world rang with it—I remember, when we were passing the revenue bill here, that I became very much impressed with it, and I know others did—"Business as usual." The result was that the high prices, the big profits, stimulated every line of industry, and especially lines that were not essential to war preparation; and it was not long before England saw that that policy must be modified, and in pursuance of a policy dictated by experience they provided a board invested with the power and authority to regulate, by license or otherwise, the investment of capital.

To-day practically all new business in Great Britain not either directly or indirectly contributory to the war has been stopped.

It has been found expedient to do substantially the same thing in this country. To this end the Secretary established in the Treasury Department a committee composed of several members of the Federal Reserve Board and some outsiders of large business experience to investigate and pass upon the character of the proposed capital issues. Where they have felt that it was not wise that the expenditures should be made, they have been making that fact known to the public; and the banks to a large extent have acted upon their suggestions or findings and withheld loans for new capital expenses found to be incompatible with the public interest. This gives legality to the action of a similar committee. It is not intended that this regulation shall extend to established businesses so far as those businesses are able to carry on their operations without any new issues of capital. It is not intended to interfere with the ordinary borrowings of such institutions through the regular channels of business. It is intended to apply solely to capital issues after the passage of the bill.

Mr. President, I do not think it is possible for us to conserve our resources for the prosecution of the war and its preparation without something of this sort. I think the provision of the bill very important, and that it will immensely aid in conserving our resources in financing of the war.

I think I have covered the important provisions of the bill, and I will not detain the Senate longer.

Mr. HOLLIS Mr. President, I desire to compliment the distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] for his very fair attitude toward this bill. He assures us that no one on the Finance Committee has any special favoritism for the measure, and that he merely lays it before us for full and fair discussion.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon, I should say in that connection, as the Senator has spoken of it in that way, that the bill came out of the Finance Committee with the unanimous approval of its members.

Mr. HOLLIS. I understand that, Mr. President.

Mr. THOMAS. "Unanimous consent" is a better way to put it.

Mr. HOLLIS. What I wish to impress upon the Senate is that this is not the bill of any particular Senator; that it is not the bill of any particular committee; that Senators are free to discuss on the floor of the Senate whatever may be involved in the bill, to amend it as it should be amended, and to pass it or not pass it, as they think wise.

This bill requires from me for the first time in my life. I believe, a speech that may be called ultraconservative. I have been known to be radical all the rest of my life, I believe, up to now. I have believed in having the Government perform progressive functions where they could do it better for the people than the people or private corporations could do it for themselves; but I am obliged to rise to-day and address myself in opposition to the extremely radical features of this socialistic, capitalistic bill.

I have noticed for the last half hour a puzzled expression on the face of the distinguished chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], who has come into the Chamber and picked up this bill and has been reading it; and I thought I saw astonishment in his face. I hope he will wait to hear the bill discussed, because it is a banking and currency measure, and one to which the Senator from Oklahoma should address himself, and one upon which the Senator from Oklahoma should give the Senate the benefit of his very sound views; for the Senator from Oklahoma was, with the distinguished Congressman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the author of the Federal reserve act, which this bill undertakes to amend in a most important particular.

What does the bill provide? This bill grants authority to do six things: To create a central United States bank; to stimulate essential industries; to discourage nonessential industries; to manipulate Government securities; to issue tax-exempt bonds, in competition with liberty bonds, with no limitation on the rate of interest; to appropriate four and a half billions of money to be spent by this United States bank without accounting to Congress.

These are enormous powers. They will revolutionize United States finances. They are likely to break down the Federal Reserve System; they are likely to depreciate the Federal reserve currency; but if we have gotten into a position where it is necessary to pass this bill, and if it can be demonstrated on the floor of the Senate, I am going to vote for it, ultraradical and socialistic as it is.

Mr. President, the consideration of this bill is very timely. For the first time the Members of the Senate are given an opportunity since last summer to discuss a matter of financing this war, to take note of stock and see where we are. I welcome the discussion. I wish it may be thoroughly debated, and I hope every member of the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate, and every member of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, will address himself to the bill and give us the benefit of his views. I undertake to say this is the biggest appropriation bill that was ever brought out on the floor of the Senate. There may be possibly one exception. Now, if this bill passes in its present form Congress turns the full control of business and governmental finance over to this new war bank. No wonder the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee hesitated to call this a bank. He called it a concern and a finance corporation, but it is a bank, as I shall presently demonstrate. It is a bank because it is given $500,000,000 of capital, because it is allowed to loan that capital to banks, persons, and corporations, because it is allowed to issue bonds, because it is allowed to buy and sell securities. You say it is not allowed to receive deposits, but what need has it to receive deposits when it has got an endless chain in the Treasury of the United States and a sucking pipe into the Treasury of the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. President, this bill is an attempt to solve the problem of converting a slow long-term credit into a quick liquid asset. I approach this subject with some diffidence and I hope with becoming modesty, but it has happened to be my lot for from three to five years, since I have been in the Senate, by direction of the Senate to devote my energy to the investigation of that particular subject. I have done so, and I have learned certain fundamental, economic principles familiar to all of you but which I desire to call to your attention, so that your minds may be refreshed. I claim no special gift in this direction, but I do claim that I have spent more time investigating it than anybody else on the floor of the Senate; that is, when I was set to the task of investigating the farmer's problem, of converting his long-term credit into a quick capital asset.

Let me, in the first place, discuss the subject of capital and credit. There are three kinds of loans—the long-term investment loan, the short-term investment loan, and the commercial or quick capital loan. We have our savings banks for the short-term investment loan and we have our national banks for the quick-term commercial loan. Under the provisions of the national bank act it was absolutely impossible for a national bank to loan any money on real estate and securities, and the first concession made in that regard was when the Federal reserve act was passed and we permitted national banks to loan on farm lands not to exceed 25 per cent of their capital and surplus. That inroad of the national banks was stoutly resisted. We were told that the national banks were commercial banks, that they were banks of deposit, that they were obliged to keep their assets in a liquid condition, so that they could respond readily and promptly to the call of their depositors. That was the first concession, but that brought up the subject of financing the farmer.

I undertake to say that every principle found in the pending war-bank bill is found in the rural-credit bill which was passed in the summer of 1916. The farmer's problem in raising crops is exactly the problem the Government has in conducting this war. There is no essential difference between them. The farmer must have capital and man power for raising his crops. The Government must have capital and man power for fighting the war. The farmer needs men to till the fields, the Government needs men for fighting, and for every man who fights the Government needs four or five others to produce goods for him to consume. The farmer needs horses, motors, trucks, plows. The Government needs horses and motors for the same purpose. The Government needs machinery. The farmer needs farm machinery. The Government must have nitrates to make explosives, the farmer must have nitrates for fertilizer. The Government must have clothing for its soldiers, the farmer must have clothing for his family and for his men. The Government must have barracks to shelter the soldiers, the farmer must have houses to shelter himself and his farm hands. All must have food, all must have ready cash. We approach this problem from precisely the same standpoint.

Now, note the difference between the two bills. In the first place, the Government gave the farm-loan banks capital to start with. I begged and entreated for $12,000,000 to start the great rural-credits banks. I was finally grudgingly given $9,000,000. This bill gives this war bank $500,000,000 to start with. We formed a farm-loan board of five men—the Secretary of the Treasury and four men to help him. Under this bill a war-bank board is formed of five men, of whom the Secretary of the Treasury is one. Under the farm-loan act the land banks are given power to loan to farmers on the security of their farms. This bank is given authority to loan to banks and corporations on the security of creditors. But note the difference between lending to a man who has productive land up to 50 per cent of the value of the land and loaning to banks and other corporations and people on a security of credit, not property, and that is the essential unsoundness of this plan.

Under the farm-loan act the securities of the bank were tax exempt. The securities to be issued by this war bank are tax exempt. Under the farm-loan act the banks were allowed to issue bonds so as to get fresh funds to loan. Under this bill the same power is given to this war bank. I do not object to it so far. I think we are in a position where we have got to do it or go bankrupt, and we are in this position because the Congress of the United States neglected to provide sufficient revenues through taxation for the Treasury of the United States. No wonder Secretary McAdoo is compelled to come down here and ask us to do these radical socialistic things because he has not the money to spend.

We were told last summer if we would not tax wealthy men so much they would buy the Government issues. It was said: "Do not cripple them; do not take away their income in taxation; we will take it from them when we need it, and we can borrow it at a reasonable figure." We started at 3½ per cent. That was well enough, but when we raised the percentage to 4 per cent the savings banks of course began to break down; and if you raise the rate to 4½ per cent, the financial ruin that will come over the country is appalling.

Now, we did not raise half enough by taxation under the war-revenue bill which we passed last summer. I am saying this perhaps with some heat, because I want to impress Members of the Senate with that fact. I am sure the Senate did not understand what it was doing last summer, and some of us here are in a position where we might say now "I told you so," but that is not a graceful attitude to be in. I am calling the attention of the Senate to this proposition now so that Senators will get their minds ready to pass an adequate tax bill to save the Government from financial ruin through the issue of an unlimited amount of inflated credit.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PITTMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. In calling attention to the fact that we did not raise enough money by taxation, of course the Senator knows I am agreeing with him on that proposition; but it seems to me we ought not to lay all the blame on Congress. There was no quarrel between Congress and the administration or the Secretary of the Treasury on that tax proposition. We raised all by taxes that the Secretary of the Treasury wanted us to raise, did we not?

Mr. HOLLIS. I thank the Senator for his question, and I wish to say I shall be glad to answer any question as well as I can, but I hope no one will interrupt me in order to make a speech. I would be very glad to answer the Senator's question. I have perhaps been known somewhat as an administration Senator. I have voted for every administration measure. I have supported the administration heartily. I wish to say to the Senator from Nebraska that it was never intimated to me by the Secretary of the Treasury or anybody connected with the administration that they thought it was unwise to raise more money by taxation. I did get from some one connected with the administration in a financial capacity—I can not think at this moment who it was; if I could, perhaps I ought not to state it—that if we could not get the money at a fair and reasonable rate so that it would not disturb business, we should take it under the power of taxation. I think if the Treasury Department could have foreseen in the present situation how the wealthy people failed to respond to the calls of the Government for loanable funds at a fair rate of interest, it would have been the first to have insisted on our raising more by taxation.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield again?

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator have any doubt that we would have raised more by taxation if the Secretary of the Treasury had asked us to do so, and has he any doubt now that we would increase the income tax on large incomes if the Secretary of the Treasury would ask us to do it? Is it not true that the Secretary of the Treasury before the Finance Committee said he did not want to change the tax law, but wanted to raise the balance of the money by bonds?

Mr. HOLLIS. I did not know that that was so; but I do not think it would change the problem in the slightest. I feel that we have our own duties to perform in discussing financial measures and passing them at this session of Congress.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me, I do not want him to misunderstand me. I agree with that statement entirely. I think we ought to determine such questions to the best of our ability in any bills that we will pass. I am satisfied, however, that with the influence of the Secretary of the Treasury, speaking for the administration, if he had wanted a higher rate or if he should want to increase the rate now, there would be no difficulty in getting it through Congress.

Mr. HOLLIS. I do not wish to commit myself to that proposition one way or the other.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HOLLIS. I hope Senators will confine themselves to questions. I have been waiting here two days to make this speech.

Mr. SMOOT. I will not interrupt the Senator, if he does not like an interruption.

Mr. HOLLIS. I am willing to answer a question.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply wished to ask the Senator if it is not a fact that this bill is not providing for money to pay the expenses of the Government. The bill simply provides means by which the Government, having monopolized the money market, can assist the people who can not borrow money or secure money in any way to take care of the refunding of their present obligations?

Mr. HOLLIS. That is very true. The cupboard is bare, and it has been swept bare, because the Government swept the money into the Treasury and used it. The distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] admitted that. The investment pool was sucked dry by the Government, because the Government had to borrow. It did not take it by taxation. The situation is exactly such as a man who studied this problem last summer ought to have foreseen.

When we were trying to get a rural-credit measure passed I was calling loudly all the time for Government aid. I did not believe that the system could be put in force quickly in this country without substantial Government aid. I had a fight to get the $9,000,000 capital. I did not have to fight so hard for tax exemption, perhaps because I think very few realized its importance, but that was substantially Government aid. Then I had put in the Senate draft of the bill, and as the bill passed the Senate, exactly the proposition that is put into this bill in order to link this United States Government bank up with the Federal reserve banks of the country. In the farm-loan act which passed the Senate there was this provision:

> Any bank of the Federal Reserve System may buy or sell farm-loan bonds—

That is still in the bill—

> any member bank of said system may accept time drafts against a deposit of such bonds as security; acceptances of a member bank thus made, or the direct obligation of such bank maturing within 60 days when accompanied by farm-loan bonds as collateral security not less in face value than the amount of such direct obligation, shall be eligible for discount by any Federal reserve bank.

I saw the necessity, if the farm-loan system was to be a complete success, of linking it up with the Federal reserve bank. I got the Senate to pass such a provision, but when we got into conference I was met by the very expert and learned gentlemen who composed the Banking and Currency Committee of the House, headed by their distinguished chairman, and those gentlemen convinced me that that proposition to link up the long-term investment securities of this country with the Federal reserve banks was dangerous. I did not agree that it was dangerous in practice as connected with the farm-loan banks, but I did agree that it was exceedingly dangerous as a precedent. Now, the precedent has been followed, even though it was not established. This bill provides that same endless chain into the Treasury of the Federal reserve banks. This bill provides a way for cashing in long-term securities by sapping the quick assets of the commercial finances of the country, and I say it is absolutely unsound; it is socialistic, dangerous, ultraradical, and the Senate should know it before it agrees to it.

Now, I wish to discuss in a little more detail the features of the bill that I have outlined. I believe that the financial situation at present makes necessary the passage of the bill. I think it is necessary to establish a United States war bank. I think it is necessary to give it the tremendous powers over the business of the country. The powers given to these four gentlemen in addition to the Secretary of the Treasury will make them veritable war lords, as they will be and I think ought to be. It is necessary that we have such men to conduct the finances of the country successfully through the present crisis. But before I give them authority to issue $4,000,000,000 of bonds and make a raid on the Federal reserve banks of this country I want to know who they are, and I want to see how they spend the $500,000,000 that is appropriated in this bill. They can not spend that $500,000,000 in a moment; it will require collection; and after we see how they spend that $500,000,000, then they can come to us, and if they can make out a good case I will vote to allow them to issue bonds. But I hope I shall never be compelled to allow them to issue bonds to be converted into cash through the medium of Federal reserve notes.

The business of the country is put in the hollow of the hand of these five war-bank men. They can turn their thumbs down on any substantial industrial class or they can turn them up as they see fit. It is an enormous power. I am willing to grant it to them. I have confidence that they will be good men and that they will do their duty to the best of their ability. But I do want them before they become members of this great war-bank directorate to sell out their interest in every other banking concern, to purge themselves of the influences of high finance, and to devote themselves patriotically to the service of their country. That is what we require of the members of the Federal Reserve Board. Mr. Warburg himself is a very famous example. There is a man who belonged to one of the great banking concerns of the world and who was trained in business. Of course, it was a tremendous financial sacrifice for him to give up his business connections, but he did it patriotically, and he has been a most valuable member of the Federal Reserve Board ever since. I believe he would have done his work as well if he had not ceased his connection with the banking interests that he had, but you could not have made the people of the United States believe it. I have hoped that the chairman will not press the amendment which cuts out that provision of the bill requiring members becoming directors of this great war bank to cease their financial connection with every other institution. These men are going to be superfinanciers. From their decision there is no appeal. They are not even obliged under the bill to account to Congress for a cent of what they spend or to tell what they have done. They can kill an industry or they can encourage an industry. I think the time has come when we have got to do that. It is not a question of business as usual in the United States. It is a question of luxury as usual. The only way you can make the people stop spending money foolishly is to tax it out of them.

A year ago I made a speech in the Senate finding fault with some grain journal in Chicago that said we ought not to attempt to regulate the price of flour, because people would not save until the pinch came. I objected to that statement coming from the grain journal because it was a statement made in defense of the right of speculation, and I am not willing to have the people of the United States pinched and go without food in order to allow some gentlemen in Chicago or elsewhere to become rich through speculation. But in order to win this war I am willing to get along on one meal a day, and I am willing to compel other people to get along on two meals a day. The situation that we are facing is too serious for trifling. Business as usual, luxury as usual, profits more than usual, and taxation, oh, yes, more than usual. Now, business should be unusual, luxury should be wiped out, and taxation should be unusually high.

Walk through any city. I had two hours in Boston the other day, and I walked out through the poorer parts of the city. Every tenth store was selling candy and gewgaws. On every substantial corner there was a cigar store or a saloon. The amount of candy that is found on display in the shop windows of this city is shameful. I came by one of the theaters last Monday morning at half-past 9, and there was a line of ticket buyers away across the sidewalk. Go into any drug store and see them lining up at the soda fountain. Go to Palm Beach and see the display of dresses and inordinate luxury. This country has not begun to save.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. If you go to Palm Beach, would it not be a lack of dresses rather than a display of them?

Mr. HOLLIS. That would depend on who went to Palm Beach. I am willing to allow each Senator to decide that for himself. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, this country has not gotten down to business yet. This country will not get down to business until it suffers more than it has been doing. I venture the statement that if we had had ships enough to ship our men and food and supplies out of the country as fast as we needed them on the other side we would be feeling the effect now, but, I am sorry to say, we have not shipped enough evidently to make a noticeable decrease in these things. But it will come, and when ships begin to roll off the ways and go into the water as fast as we are going to produce them, then they will be able to take our food and clothing as well as our men abroad.

I hope the Senate will indulge itself enough to discuss this bill thoroughly. Some one may have an idea that it will be useful to the Treasury in this war crisis. I am not blaming the Treasury Department for asking for this bill. If I were in power in the Treasury Department, I would ask for the bill. But I should be ashamed, as a Senator of the United States, to allow the financial condition as regards taxation to continue any longer than is necessary in a situation that has made this bill necessary.

This bill transfers the money control from Wall Street to Fifteenth and Pennsylvania Avenue, from the house of Morgan, from the house of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., from the house of Kidder, Peabody & Co. to the Nation's war bank. We heard a good deal a few years ago about a Money Trust. Money Trust meant control of the finances of this country, so that a few gentlemen in Wall Street could turn their thumbs down or turn them up on any large financial proposition. I am convinced that that Money Trust existed, and if we have taken it from Wall Street and planted it in the Treasury of the United States as a war measure I say, Amen. But I am very much interested to know who is going to be on the board before I grant the very extraordinary features that are contained in the latter part of the bill.

Now, reverting to the discussion of the credit and capital from which I was a little diverted, what is spent in the war is what is already on hand. We can not fire a cannon until it is produced. We can not use a soldier until we produce him to manhood. We can not have a blanket or uniform until it is ready to be used. The amount of goods on hand to devote to any purpose at any time is strictly limited.

There are two kinds of capital. One is fixed capital, which is locked up in mills and railroads and ships and so on. The other is called circulating capital or capital goods. The Government in war is a tremendous spendthrift. It does not produce anything—it seldom ever does—but in war it is the greatest spendthrift there is. We call in political economy the man a spendthrift who has wasted his money on tobacco and champagne. That is what they tell schoolboys; later we say on wine, women, and song. That is because the spendthrift takes what he can get and expends it without producing anything to take its place. Business takes capital goods and reproduces more than it put into them or else it is not successful. The farmer takes seed in the spring of the year and reproduces it four or five fold. That is what business is. Business is to take capital goods and turn them over so that you will have more capital goods when you get through. In war that position is absolutely reversed. The Government takes horses, motors, food, clothing, explosives, machinery, aeroplanes, and expends them, and you are all the time taking out of the till and you are never putting anything back. It is obvious that if we go on with luxury as usual and taxation as usual we do not save anywhere, and we should have more taxation for the express purpose of paying our bills and also making people pay.

I do not want a consumption tax. I have on my desk a tax receipt for $1 tax on a citizen of New Hampshire for carrying a watch in war time. Evidently every man who carried a watch had to pay $1 a year for the privilege in war time. I hate to see those taxes come. I would first exhaust our resources in the way of taxes on large incomes, on genuine war profits, and we could get two or three billion more out of that if we had the courage to go at it and take it.

Just think what position the Treasury would be in now if instead of having $3,000,000,000 in taxes coming in the 1st of July it was going to have $6,000,000,000! Then it would be well enough to go to the Federal reserve bank to get short-time obligations on currency, because it would be paid back when the taxes came in. No; this bill diverts the stream of productive capital into essential industries and diverts it from nonessential industries. It takes, practically, capital from the control of one group of capitalization and gives it to another.

This control of productive capital makes it a banking proposition and makes it a national money trust; but instead of being a Wall Street money trust it is a Government money trust. Through it the Government will absolutely control the course of industry in the United States. I hope Senators will not blink the fact. We are doing it, and I say, Amen. We must do it to pull out of this lamentable financial condition in which we are. It should have been done long ago.

Mr. President, this is a currency proposition. It permits an inflation of credit and an inflation of currency. Whenever you issue bonds for war purposes you are inflating credit. That is easy to be shown. Suppose a man has a thousand dollars in a savings bank and takes it and buys a Government bond of a thousand dollars. The Government takes his thousand dollars and spends it. The man has his thousand-dollar bond. He can go and sell that bond if he can find a purchaser, or he can borrow on it almost to its entire value. The issue of bonds for war purposes does inflate credit. We can not lay all this inflation on the increase of gold coming into this country. I wish we could, but it can not be done. In the testimony of Mr. Warburg before the Finance Committee he spoke more than once of the tremendous inflation that would result from this bill. He knows it. He did not say this bill was a desirable thing. Mr. Harding, the governor of the Federal Reserve Board, did not say this bill was a desirable thing. They both said that the bill was a necessary thing, and that they did not know where else to turn if it were not passed.

I am not afraid that the Federal Reserve Board will allow the Federal reserve currency to become tremendously inflated. It has become inflated already. That is one trouble with any elastic currency. They are always ready to inflate it, but they are never ready to deflate it. We have got out now about $1,250,000,000 of Federal reserve currency. That leaves us 66 per cent gold reserve. That is the safest paper currency there is. We could, by carrying out the terms of this bill, issue $2,000,000,000 more, and we would still have a 40 per cent gold reserve, and that would still be the safest paper currency in the world. But what have we done? We have not got another bushel of wheat or another cannon or another blanket in the war out of the performance. We have merely issued $2,000,000,000 more of paper currency that will lift prices all over the world.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HOLLIS. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is not the amount of the additional issue $1,700,000,000, instead of $2,000,000,000?

Mr. HOLLIS. I took Mr. Warburg's statement concerning it. He is pretty nearly right. That is his specialty, and I think he knows, but if it is $1,700,000,000, then it is so much less dangerous. They can not, however, inflate it much more than $1,700,000,000 more than it is now.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GERRY. Does not the Senator think that very likely the mere fact of the creation of this corporation will prevent the use of this power—the sale of these bonds to extend credit?

Mr. HOLLIS. I wish I did.

Mr. GERRY. If the Senator has read the testimony of Mr. Harding and of Mr. Warburg he probably has found that that was their hope.

Mr. HOLLIS. I have studied very carefully the testimony of Mr. Warburg and of Mr. Harding; I have great faith in both those men; but I did not see any evidence of confidence on their part. They said that sometimes when funds were available people did not want them, but I have not any fear that people will be timid under this bill. You will find corporations and individuals all over this country trying to hook on to this great war bank. You will not find any modesty, even on the part of the savings banks or insurance companies from trying to get on in some way. I am sorry to say that I do not believe that the fact that this $500,000,000 or $4,500,000,000 is available is going to abate the appetites of financiers. I think it will rather whet their appetites.

Credit in the form of Government bonds inflates prices. Mr. Warburg said that, and every financier and every economist who has given the matter thought says it. We are putting it in the power of this corporation to take $500,000,000 out of the Treasury. Where will the Treasury get it? The Treasury can only get it by the issue of more bonds. Who is going to buy those bonds? Then we give this corporation the right to issue $4,000,000,000 of bonds on top of its capital. Where is that money coming from? Why, that is merely additional credit; that merely puts those who have those securities in the field to bid against the Government for funds. The reason we have got to do it is because the Government has exhausted the investment field. The Government has got to borrow this $500,000,000, and then it is going to allow this corporation to issue

$4,000,000,000 of bonds without fixing the rate of interest. I had to fix the rate of interest in order to get the rural-credits bill through. Bonds can not be issued by any of the land banks bearing more than 5 per cent interest, but the bonds of the proposed finance corporation can be issued at any rate of interest at which the members of the corporation choose to issue them.

How will it work? We are appropriating this money because we are giving the corporation the right to issue securities by which it can go into the market and buy things—not even things; I wish they were going to buy things; but they are going to buy credit. Credit is nothing in the world but a hope that some one will pay; that is all it is. A credit is a promise to pay; it is faith given to some one that he will pay. How can the men who wish to get money to carry on their essential industries get the money? If they could borrow it from their commercial banks, to be locked up in long-term enterprises, they would bankrupt the commercial banks.

The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. SIMMONS] complains because the Federal reserve banks are discriminating against this sort of loaning. It is their business to so discriminate, because they are short-term banks.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me for an interruption?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not complain. I simply stated a fact; and stated it as a fact.

Mr. HOLLIS. Well, the word "discriminate" carries with it a little tinge of complaint; but it is a fact that these banks do discriminate against locking up their liquid funds in long-term investments.

The captains of industry who want money to put up factories or other enterprises needed to conduct the war can not borrow the money from their regular banks; therefore they go to their respective banks and say, "If you will take our securities, our stock, or our bonds, you can go to this war bank in Washington and they will either give you the funds or will give you their bonds." So the local bank cashes in the securities, and then comes to Washington and finds that the war bank at Washington has exhausted its capital of $500,000,000. The manager of the bank in Washington says, "We can not give you money, but we can give you bonds." That is the scheme of the Hon. David Lubin for financing the rural-credit banks; that is the German landschaften scheme. There a farmer would go to a bank and mortgage his land and he would get a land-bank bond. Then he would sell it in the market for whatever it would bring. That is the great vice of this measure, because the local bank, having come to Washington, cashed in the securities of the local industry for one of these war-bank bonds, or a series of them, at what per cent we do not know, can then go back and dispose of them at 90, 80, or 50 per cent of their face value, depreciating the bonds, or can put them up as collateral security for a note in the Federal reserve bank at a ratio of 1, 2, or 3 to 1. Then the local bank can loan money on the obligation of the local industry, secured by the bonds of the war bank. Then the local bank is in position by giving its note, not to exceed 90 days, to the Federal reserve bank of discounting and drawing from the Federal reserve bank cash on that transaction. Then the Federal reserve bank is in a position to put up the note secured by the bonds and get Federal reserve notes. That is a very long, tedious, and circuituous route; but it will not deceive anybody who really puts his mind on the transaction. It is nothing in the world but an effort to convert the securities of an industrial corporation, with the indorsement of the Government upon them, into a liquid form so that currency can be issued in their stead. That is all it is, and it is all it pretends to be. As I have already said, that will result in greater inflation.

The direct way is the best. I complained two months ago because the Farm Loan Board had not sold its securities on the market. Senators will recall that I came into the Senate and asked permission for the Treasury to purchase $200,000,000 of farm-loan bonds. That was necessary because the investment market had been swept bare. I was told that the Farm Loan Board had not tried to sell the bonds because they did not want to interfere with the liberty-bond drive; and there is something in that, for the farm-loan bonds were a more attractive bond at 4½ per cent than the Government bonds at 4 per cent.

If the proposed Government finance corporation is permitted to issue its bonds, they will come in direct competition with the next issue of liberty bonds—it can not be helped—and they will not sell unless they carry a greater rate of interest than the liberty bonds; but the Government is morally back of them, and the Government will not allow any of these war-bank bonds to be defaulted. We shall be asked to back them up and we will do it. If we have got to have this capital to devote to essential industry in this country for the successful prosecution of the war, the best way to do is to borrow it all on liberty bonds and not place another lot of bonds on the market at a higher rate of interest, possibly, and prevent the Government from borrowing on liberty bonds. I do not want to see the liberty bonds in competition with bonds that carry a higher rate of interest. If the Government is going to finance these great industries, let the Government borrow the money on straight bonds, finance the industries, and take their obligations, for that is all it will get in the end. You can not make credit on such a basis as that. You may deceive some people, but you have not any more back of it by going through all this mummery and setting the printing presses going and issuing these different kinds of bonds. You do not get any more out of it than you do if you borrow the money through the Government direct and loan it to these industries direct.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, does not the Senator overlook the fact that in all the loans made by this proposed corporation to industries, except public-utilities corporations, the Government receives, in addition to the security of the original borrower, the industrial corporation, the obligation of the bank, through which alone these advances can be made to the industrial corporation?

Mr. HOLLIS. I do not overlook that. The credit of these banks and their soundness are absolutely essential to conducting the ordinary commerce and business of this country; and when those banks are allowed to issue acceptances on obligations of industrial corporations, which is precisely what it is proposed to do, those banks are weakened. If those banks are of any benefit to the community, it is because they serve commerce and business on quick commercial transactions, and when you allow them to write acceptances in an unlimited amount on obligations of this sort you merely allow them to kite securities. Why, they are taking now out of the Federal reserve banks enormous sums——

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator think that the banks of the country would likely be willing to put their indorsement upon the paper that they discount or sell to the finance corporation unless they had carefully investigated and satisfied themselves that the security which they had taken from the borrower was ample and sufficient?

Mr. HOLLIS. Then, if they are satisfied as to that, why do they not lend them the money themselves and not come to the Government?

Mr. SIMMONS. They have not the money, that is the difficulty, and this measure is designed to accommodate that present situation.

Mr. HOLLIS. It is because they have not got the money, and this is to allow them to turn long-term Government securities into quick assets of a commercial bank—something that is unsound.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator, I presume, also has not overlooked the fact that the issue of currency upon these securities must be based upon 90-day paper or short-term paper?

Mr. HOLLIS. I am glad the Senator has suggested that, because that is an attempted compliance with the theory of the Federal reserve act, but it is not a compliance with it in its most essential particulars. The currency issued by the Federal reserve banks is based on short-term obligations, but it is, more important still, based on a self-liquidating security. Under the present act there are two classes of securities that can be put up. The principal one that is allowed is the security based on a business transaction, a note for 90 days or less. The other one is more or less of an excrescence; they are allowed to put up Government bonds as security. That, however, was understood to be an excrescence. No one thought that that ought to be done, but it was not desired to discount Government obligations and make them of less value than commercial obligations. The fact that that is not looked upon with favor by financiers is shown by the circumstance that, with all the billions of Government bonds that are now outstanding, the Federal Reserve Board has only permitted $343,000,000 to be put up as security for Federal reserve notes; and I hope that the Federal Reserve Board will stand firm as a rock on that proposition and not permit Federal reserve notes to be issued unless based on a security that is self-liquidating. Of course, Senators understand what is meant by "self-liquidating."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The same limitation is placed upon these bonds. The Federal Reserve Board determines whether they may be put up and can also charge an extra rate on the notes issued.

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes; that is true, but the pressure that is already put upon these gentlemen, as appears from their testimony, is enormous. There is nowhere in that testimony a whole-hearted encouragement for or argument in favor of this plan. They are brought in and they tell the bad situation we are in. They say they think this $500,000,000 will tide them over so that they will not need any more, but that if it does not, then they certainly should be given this power to issue bonds up to $4,000,000,000, and that we need not be afraid that they will issue any more than they need, and so on. That is always the argument.

But the vice of allowing these bonds to be put up is that they are to be issued for the express purpose of being put up as security for Federal-reserve notes and that they do not possess the self-liquidating feature. I will explain in a word to the Senate what I mean by "self-liquidating feature." Under the Federal-reserve act a member bank can not get Federal-reserve notes from a Federal-reserve agent without putting up its own obligations secured by notes that have been rediscounted for the member bank, which are payable in 90 days or less, and which are based on a commercial transaction. That means that the man who borrows of any member bank must be engaged in business which will be ended in 90 days, so that the obligation will be paid off with the hope of profit. That is self-liquidating. These long-term bonds are not self-liquidating. I wish they were.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not suppose the Senator would suggest that liberty bonds, against which notes may be issued, are self-liquidating any more than are the long-term bonds to be issued by the proposed corporation?

Mr. HOLLIS. No; they are not. They are not so quickly liquid, because they run 20 years, while the bonds of the proposed corporation will run 5 years; but 5 years' liquidation in war times is not worth considering.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, one is as liquid a security as is the other.

Mr. HOLLIS. Just about, and the finance-corporation bonds will be a little more liquid, because they will run for only five years; but I do not call that liquid.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood the Senator to say that the Federal Reserve Board had not encouraged the issuance of notes against the liberty bonds?

Mr. HOLLIS. That is true.

Mr. SIMMONS. And that resulted, as we all know, in keeping down the additional currency issued on account of the bonds to about $300,000,000. Now, the Senator says he approves of that policy. If the board should apply that same policy to the issuance of notes against these bonds we could not reasonably expect any greater inflation from these bonds than from a like number of liberty bonds.

Mr. HOLLIS. Well, if the Federal Reserve Board had reached its limit in that respect, then it would be useless to issue these bonds with any hope that they are going to be used as a basis for currency—we have got more of it than we can use now—but these bonds are to be issued with the express idea that they are going to be used for that purpose, and these men will be more than human if they are able to withstand the pressure.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator think he is entirely correct in making that statement? The bonds are to be issued with the express idea that they may be discounted at the Federal reserve bank by the member bank holding them. I do not know that there is any purpose to make them more available or eligible for use for issuing purposes than liberty bonds are eligible for such purpose.

Mr. HOLLIS. The attempt is to hook them up with the commercial banks of the country and get commercial capital to use them for long-term purposes. The Senator speaks of the Federal reserve banks as if they had money to loan. They have not money to loan; they were not created for that purpose. What have they? They have a capital of $73,000,000 that we clubbed out of the national banks, of which we made every national bank pay its share or else go out of business. The Federal reserve banks have that for capital. What else have they? They have Government deposits of just $56,000,000; and if the Government dared to take that away it would do so, as it has use for it. Then, what else have they? All else in the world is the reserves that belong to the national banks. They have $1,460,000,000 of these reserves that were not meant to be loaned and ought not to be loaned. That is the quickest liability this Government has, and it is in the Federal reserve banks. That money belongs to the member banks—it constitutes their reserves—and if there happens to be a run on our banks that money will be needed to put out the conflagration.

The Federal reserve banks were never organized to loan money themselves. The only way that they are in shape to loan anything is by issuing paper currency, which is good paper currency, but nothing but currency. So you can not get any loans out of the Federal reserve banks, because they have not the money to loan. The only thing that can be obtained from them is currency. Their function is to issue currency.

I say this is socialistic, but when I say that I do not mean to condemn it. I am for certain socialistic aims; I am for them when they are sound and when there is reasonable hope that they will work. But I wish to inquire why it is that socialism to help capital and to help the well to do is sound and respectable while socialism to help the poor is unsound and disreputable.

It does not hurt this with me at all to call it socialistic, but I want the conservative gentlemen who have been talking about sound, economic principles during the five years I have been in the Senate to realize that they are doing a socialistic thing. I am proud to have them join me, but I do not want them to ask me to go too far in the path of socialism.

I do not want any Government agency to try to manipulate or stabilize the price of United States bonds. That power is in this bill. They can not do it. If they attempt it, it will be disastrous. The only reason why they should try it is because the price of liberty bonds is declining. Then, if they had money enough they might go into the market and buy liberty bonds and put their price up; but what a foolish thing that would be. That would mean that the people who have bought liberty bonds already and have got credit on them from their local banks will sell them back to the Government and get a lot more credit by borrowing more on the new issue of liberty bonds. I am willing to trust the Secretary of the Treasury and these four superfinanciers if they want to be trusted to that extent, but I hope Congress will stay in session and will watch the proceeding.

I do not want any Government securities indorsed by the Government or permitted to be issued by the Government to be sold in competition with the liberty bonds, especially with no limit on the interest rate. Investors will not buy liberty bonds if they can get other sound bonds at a higher rate. There is no need of other bonds being issued, because we can borrow just as well on liberty bonds.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As these bonds when sold will be practically always under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury, and as he is directing the selling of liberty bonds, does the Senator suppose that there will be any possible conflict in the sales?

Mr. HOLLIS. Unless he can in some way make them more desirable than liberty bonds, they will perform no function whatever, because he has got plenty of liberty bonds. The only way to use these other bonds, these superbonds, is to put them out on a more attractive basis of some sort; and the only way I know by which that can be done is to pay more interest on them.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But the Senator was arguing that they might interfere with the sale of liberty bonds, and I ask him if he does not think the Secretary of the Treasury will certainly guard us against that.

Mr. HOLLIS. The Finance Committee has not guarded us against that. The Secretary of the Treasury asked to be allowed to appoint these other four men himself, but the Finance Committee were not willing to trust him to do that; so that they are to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and they will outvote the Secretary of the Treasury 4 to 1. That is in the bill, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the junior Senator from New Hampshire yield to the senior Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. May I suggest to my colleague that the Secretary of the Treasury, of his own volition, stated that he was quite willing to have that change made?

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes; I have no doubt he would compromise on almost anything to get himself out of the financial hole that Congress has plunged him in. If he is to get this bill through, it is necessary to have the Finance Committee with him. He agreed to that and agreed to some other things that I believe he did not want to agree to.

Now, about the savings banks. The savings banks are tremendously important institutions. In my part of the country they pay as high as 4 per cent interest.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the bill itself provides that the rate of interest and terms of sale of these bonds can not be controlled by the directors, but the directors, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, are required to act. The Secretary of the Treasury can veto their action with reference to the sale of these bonds. I think that was intended, perhaps, to guard the very proposition to which the Senator has referred.

Mr. HOLLIS. I hope it will work in that way. I thank the Senator for calling my attention to that; I had overlooked it.

Now, discussing the savings-bank situation. The poor people save their money, and they save it in my part of the country at great personal sacrifice. They have to economize. The people in my section of the country, however, bought war savings stamps and they bought liberty bonds on the installment plan. There is no stimulation of business up there because of the war; in fact, some businesses are very low, because people can not buy the sort of goods they produce. They put their money in the savings banks and they get from 3½ to 4 per cent interest on it. Now, the Government comes along and offers them a bond at 3½ per cent. They will not draw their funds out of the savings banks to buy 3½ per cent bonds; but when the Government offers a bond at 4 per cent they will begin to draw their money out of the savings banks; and if the Government issues a bond at 4½ per cent, I do not see what any savings-bank depositor is thinking of to let his money remain there.

The savings banks usually invest their funds in long-term securities, because as a rule the savings banks continue to increase their deposits; a large amount of their deposits is never withdrawn at one time and, therefore, it is safe for savings banks to have their investments in semiliquid securities; but at a time like this if a 4½ per cent bond is issued, savings-bank depositors will find it good business to withdraw their deposits and invest them in Government bonds. You can not appeal to their patriotism and ask them not to do it, because patriotism does not extend much further with the poor people than it does with the rich people; it goes just about as far, but no farther.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does not the Senator think that if this statement is true, the question of the parity of these bonds is very vital? Of course if the bond drops below par, the savings-bank depositor is just as well off with his savings certificate as he would be with his bond, because that is always at par and easily gotten out of the bank. I do not see just the temptation to surrender the savings-bank certificate for the bond at 4½ per cent unless its parity is to be assured.

Mr. HOLLIS. The savings-bank investor puts his money in the savings bank and leaves it there to accumulate. When he buys a Government bond, he knows that it is going to be paid in full when it matures. He is not much interested as to whether it depreciates on the market or not. He is satisfied that it is going to be paid. But the point is this: Because these bonds at 4 per cent may not meet a ready sale, the proposition is to put them up to 4½ per cent, so that they will sell at par; and when a 4½ per cent bond is put out at par, then the temptation is great for the savings-bank depositor to draw his money and put it into the bonds.

I am willing to give this war bank $500,000,000 of capital. I think they will do an enormous amount of good with it. They will encourage essential industries. Through their investment-issues committee they will discourage nonessential industries. I believe that is true, but I do not want to give them more than $500,000,000, and $500,000,000 to start with. If investors, capitalists, bankers, public utilities, and savings-bank trustees know that they have credit up to the amount of $4,500,000,000, the demand on them will be something frightful, and these men will have to be more than superfinanciers to resist it; and we ought to protect them by limiting the amount appropriated under this bill to $500,000,000.

There are two fundamental objects of government in war times. The first is to win the war and the second is to maintain the people during the war. We must produce subsistence for ourselves, our soldiers, and our allies, and we must produce engines of war to destroy our enemies. Capital goods available for production are limited. If we expend them for luxuries, we can not expend them for munitions and necessities. The best way, as I have suggested, to prevent expenditures for luxuries is to increase taxes. By taking from the people through taxation, we take away the power to waste money on luxuries; we take away the power to compete with the Government for capital goods. That is a better way to curb the production of nonessentials than to constitute a capital-investment committee. This taxation should be imposed on consumption as a last resort. The poor should be saved as long as possible. Instead of harming all the people by borrowing, and consequent inflation, we should get the last dollar from, first, income taxes on large incomes, and, second, genuine excess-profits taxes.

Through our own actions on the floor of the Senate and through the action of the conference committee our taxation on excess profits was robbed of its title. It has no claim to be called an excess-profits tax, or at least a war-profits tax. It is merely a graduated income tax on corporations—something that I have spoken against more than once in the Senate. But this year there will undoubtedly be five billions of profits due to the war. If the stories from Hog Island and other parts of the country are true, there will be a great deal more. Now, we evidently are not able to curb the extravagances in war expenditures; we evidently are not able to keep down the prices of subsistence; but we are able to take out of the excessive profits of capital and business a very large share in the shape of excess profits, and we will be recreant to our duty if we do not do it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. A little while ago a question was asked by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] about the attitude of the Secretary of the Treasury toward this tax bill last summer. I recall very distinctly that the Secretary was very much in favor of a larger measure of taxation then, just as I think the Senator from New Hampshire was, and I was, and various Senators were on the floor. I want to say that in my judgment the Senator from Nebraska is wrong in stating that the Secretary of the Treasury was not then in favor of a higher rate of taxation. My recollection is that he started out with a fifty-fifty proposition on expenditures to be made by our own Government, and I think it is fair that that statement should be made at this time.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Nobody would be more delighted than I if the Secretary of the Treasury, representing the administration as he does, had favored such a thing as that. No one would be more delighted than I, if instead of saying, as I understand he did before the Finance Committee of this Congress, that he was not in favor of changing the tax law, but wanted to raise this money by bonds, he had taken the other course and said, "Increase the taxes on large incomes and war profits." I never heard it stated, here or elsewhere, when that bill was pending, that the Secretary of the Treasury asked us to increase taxation on large incomes.

Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. SIMMONS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield, and to whom?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield. I yield to either or both of the Senators.

Mr. McKELLAR. I can only say that I recall very distinctly having talked to the Secretary about it at the time, and he was in thorough accord with raising more money by taxation than the committee had reported out at that time. He was actively in accord with it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if that is the position——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must ask Senators to address the Chair, so that the Chair may be able to protect the Senator who has the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. I addressed the Chair.

Mr. HOLLIS. I am in the hands of my friends.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HOLLIS. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Secretary of the Treasury holds that position we can double the tax on large incomes in 10 days from now, if we have a message from the President advocating it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield for that purpose?

Mr. HOLLIS. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What part of the large incomes do we now take? Do we not take over 60 per cent?

Mr. SIMMONS. Sixty-seven per cent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, how could wo double it?

Mr. NORRIS. That is not the question involved. If the Secretary is in favor of increasing taxes on large incomes, in my judgment—and I do not believe anyone will dispute it who knows how laws are enacted here and the influence of the administration—if the influence of the administration is behind it, and the President will ask it in an official message, in less than 10 days the law will be changed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; but I was asking the Senator how you could double it if you take 67 per cent of the large incomes now? [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. Well, that would not be very hard to do, with the administration behind it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I made a rash remark a little while ago when I said I was willing to yield to both Senators. It does not work very well when both are yielded to at once, because both can not talk at once.

I recall distinctly that some one connected with the administration said to me last summer, "If we can not borrow enough money to finish this war at 3½ per cent, then we believe that the taxation should be raised." I thought I had some assurance there; but I do not recall who said it, and I will not even say that anyone did; but I felt that those who were running the finances of the Government had an idea that they could borrow all the money that was needed at 3½ per cent, because it was obvious to anyone who studied the question that if they put out bonds at 4 per cent they were going to prevent ordinary businesses from getting money for their ordinary obligations; they were going to drain the savings banks.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. OWEN. I merely wanted to suggest to the Senator that the 3½ per cent bonds, not being taxable, were easily floated, and they have maintained their high price, while the 4 per cent bonds, being taxable, do not sell at so good a figure; and that I am in accord with him that the Government of the United States can not raise the rate of interest above the point which is fixed by the savings banks of this country without having a very serious withdrawal of funds from those banks, which they can not meet.

Mr. HOLLIS. I thank the Senator for his reenforcement of my idea; and since we are on this question of what the Government income is, and how much more it might be, I will submit at this point a few figures.

Under the old revenue laws, as they existed before we passed the war-revenue act last summer, the revenue of the Government was $1,357,000,000. I will give these figures approximately. Under the new revenue law it was estimated that the corporation tax—that is, the excise tax—would yield $360,000.000 additional; that the personal income taxes would yield $450,000,000 additional; that the excess-profits tax would yield $1,500,000,000 additional; spirits, $207,000,000; tobacco, $56,000,000; transportation, $150,000,000; making a total of new taxes of $2,723,-000,000, or a total income of the Government for the current year of $4,080,000,000.

Now, the excess-profits tax was figured on profits of $4,000,-000,000. I believe myself that they will amount to $5,000,000,000 this year. If we should take 80 per cent of the $4,000,000,000, we would get $1,700,000,000 more than we are getting now. We might easily increase the taxes on large personal incomes by $500,000,000. That would make $2,200,000,000 more that we could raise from taxation from these two sources. That would give the Government an income of $6,280,000,000, which would be 50 per cent more than it is now. I believe that if we were raising that amount through taxation we could raise the rest by floating bonds at a reasonable rate.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. OWEN. I did not hear clearly whether or not the Senator included inheritance taxes there.

Mr. HOLLIS. I did not, because the amount received from them is not very large.

Mr. OWEN. But the receipts from inheritance taxes could be made very large by dealing with some of the gigantic estates, which we know are growing beyond the possibility of the owners of those estates to employ. The Government of the United States could, with great propriety, pass an inheritance-tax law that would appropriate a substantial part of these gigantic estates very profitably for the moral effect upon the country as well as for the effect upon the exchequer; and, besides that, it has the very great advantage of being a tax against which no man kicks, because he is then dead.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. His estate kicks, however.

Mr. HOLLIS. If he is surely dead, that is true. The Senator has made an investigation of that subject; and I will ask him how much in addition to what we now raise by inheritance taxes he thinks we might fairly raise?

Mr. OWEN. I have no adequate figures with regard to it; but we all have observed, in recent times, the gigantic growth of some of the estates of the country, which have grown as much as an estimated amount of a thousand million dollars, such as the Weyerhauser estate, the Rockefeller properties, and so forth, or like the Bingham estate, which I am told amounted to $68,000,000. There is a proper limit at which the ownership of property serves no useful purpose. After it passes beyond all demands of luxury and of extravagance itself, there comes a time when the ownership of property merely means the unrestrained control over the lives of other people; and I think that the policy of the Government of the United States ought to be adjusted keeping that in view.

The difficulty has been, as I understand it, that the States are to some extent alleged to be jealous of this arrangement; but the fact is that no State can really control that matter, because a very large estate can have itself transferred from one jurisdiction to another whenever the inheritance-tax law promises to be injurious to the heirs of the estate. A man can take his citizenship from one State to another, and evade the law, therefore, until all 48 States have a uniform law, which never will occur; but this matter could be so adjusted that the States should receive a proportionate part of the funds derived from inheritance taxes, and a large inheritance tax on gigantic estates ought to be established as a public policy in times of peace—much more so in times of war.

Mr. HOLLIS. I thank the Senator.

A government is like an individual. If an individual has a large income, he may have enough capital goods at his own disposal so that he does not need to borrow other capital goods, through money or through credits, in order to carry on his business. When such a man goes to a bank to borrow, they will ask him for a statement; and he can borrow or not, and the amount he can borrow will be determined by the showing of his income. If his business is profitable, and he is getting a large income, the bank will loan to him even if he has not very much in the way of investment or fixed capital; and so it is with a government.

The Government gets its money to spend from two sources. One is through its income, which is taxation—and that is substantially all the income the Government of the United States has, through taxation—and it gets its other money to spend through borrowing. If it has a very large income in proportion to its expenditures, of course it can borrow more cheaply than it can if it has a small income and large expenditures; and there is a tremendous difference in the balance sheet of the Government if the Government shows that it has an income of four billions and is spending fifteen billions than if it has income of six billions and is spending thirteen billions. It looks very differently to any financier who looks into it.

We appropriated, last summer, some twenty billions. I was not frightened at that statement, because I knew we could not spend it all in a year. The industries of this country will not produce enough so that you can spend all that money in a year. We have had six months of it, and we have spent about a quarter of the amount we appropriated. We will do well if we produce enough so that we can spend more than a quarter more in the second six months. The expenditures of the Government this year will not exceed ten or twelve billions; and if we could raise six billions by taxes we would be in a splendid financial condition.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GORE. I will remind the Senator that if we would lay as high taxes now as we did lay during the Civil War, they would yield an annual income of six billions or a little in excess of that.

Mr. HOLLIS. I thank the Senator for calling my attention to that. In the Civil War we did exactly what we are doing in this war. We started out for two or three years and tried to finance the Government on credit. We did other things in the Civil War that we did in the Spanish War: We exposed our soldiers to typhoid fever, and to embalmed beef, and things of that sort. I thought that when we had the Spanish War we would learn better, and we have in those respects; but here we are conducting, as we think, the chief part in the greatest war of history, and we are repeating the financial mistakes that we made in 1861, 1862, and 1863. It was not until the Civil War had been in progress for three years that the Government of the United States awakened to the fact that the only way to fight a war and do business approximately as usual was to increase taxation; and finally it was done. It seems very strange that with all the information at our disposal, with all the history and the books, with all the political economies that are written, and with all the professors of economics dinning this fact into our ears, we have got to wait and learn the lesson by bitter experience by passing this highly socialistic measure.

The refusal of the Finance Committee to levy as large income taxes and excess-profits taxes as possible has made this war bank and this money trust and this undue inflation necessary. I shall support the bill because it is necessary, but I am not going to support any more of its extreme features than I have to. I shall offer some amendments that I hope will improve the bill. If they are voted down, I am going to vote for the bill anyhow, because we have bankruptcy staring us in the face if we do not put this bill through; and we are going to try to take care of an inflated credit by more inflated credit.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator, I think very correctly, has stated that our real expenditures during the first year probably will not be more than half of our appropriations. Can the Senator state what he thinks our total expenditures will be for the first year, then?

Mr. HOLLIS. I said ten or twelve billions. Let us call it twelve billions; and we will raise four billions of that by taxation, if we are lucky.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator think it will be as much as twelve billions?

Mr. HOLLIS. I should think so. We spent at about a 50 per cent rate for the first six months, and we probably will increase that the second six months, because we are getting ready for it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, is that exclusive of the amounts loaned to our allies?

Mr. HOLLIS. I thing that includes the whole thing. I think it does. I think the amounts loaned to the allies will bring it all up to about twenty billions, and I think that up to the 1st of January we had spent about a quarter of that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then the Senator's estimate is that we will have raised by taxes about one-third instead of half?

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes; about a third. Now, if our income is large enough, there is no reason why we should not be able to float these bonds at 3½ per cent. There is no reason why we should be talking about a 4½ per cent rate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the difficulty about it is the tax upon the bonds, is it not? We make the income from the bonds subject to our excess-profits taxes, going up to 68 per cent when the income passes a million dollars, or something like that.

Mr. HOLLIS. That has some bearing on it; but I will call the attention of the Senator to the fact that that is only a difference of about one-half of 1 per cent, because the 3½ per cent bonds, which have the tax-exempt feature to its extreme, are selling on about a parity with the 4 per cent bonds, that do not have the tax-exempt feature in its extreme form, so it is worth about one-half of 1 per cent on the figures.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The tax-exempt feature?

Mr. HOLLIS. The tax-exempt feature; it is so considered by the investors, because the market shows it. Does the Senator get my reasoning on that point?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; I get the Senator's reasoning, but is not this true: Only a little over $50,000,000 of the bonds of the last large issue have been offered on the market. The great bulk of them have not gone upon the market at all, and just a slightly increased buying capacity would put the bonds now on the market right up to par again.

Mr. HOLLIS. I hope that is so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will state to the Senator that I have been advised—we were so informed by witnesses before the Finance Committee—that the bonds offered for sale did not reach $6,000,000 in all, so far as they could find out, and that just a small buying movement would put them back to par at once.

Mr. HOLLIS. I am afraid that with the investment pool sucked dry there will not be that buying movement again right away.

Money, bonds, currency, credits, securities, stocks, evidences of debt, banks, financial corporations, money trusts, a United States bank, produce nothing. They are merely tools which direct the flow of real capital into certain productive channels and away from others. The amount of production is determined by the amount of wool, cotton, dyes, ore, coal, logs, iron, copper, lumber, lime, wheat, corn, oats, hay, horses, mules, motors, and other supplies and materials which are available. If we assign them exclusively to one industry, other industries must cease. All the dangers we pictured last summer are real ones. We can not borrow enough money at reasonable rates; there is inflation; capital is not available for ordinary uses, and the remedy proposed is more bonds and more inflation. It should be more taxation.

We wer told last summer not to have high income taxes so that capitalists might have capital for business purposes, so we have small taxes and large borrowings. The result is, we are now asked to finance private businesses because capitalists have no money for private businesses.

When the Government gets a dollar by taxation its assets increase exactly $1. When it gets a dollar by borrowing, it adds that dollar to both its resources and its liabilities. It adds nothing to its net assets, because it has to pay back every dollar with interest. You can not get relief in this situation by swapping credits from the war bank to national banks, Federal reserve banks, and Federal reserve notes. You merely cause inflation.

The proposition is to help an essential industry—called in the bill an industry that is necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war—to get capital by exchanging war-finance bonds for the corporation's stocks or bonds. Let us see how it works out. Take some essential industry that desires to build a power plant for war purposes. Take an electric-power plant, for example. It can not get funds in the market, because liberty bonds have sucked the investment pool dry. It applies to the war bank. It receives war-finance bonds for its stock or bonds. It can not sell the bonds, because the war bank can not, so it goes to a commercial bank and pays a rate high enough to procure the funds. The bank puts up the war-finance bonds as collateral with the Federal reserve bank, which discounts the note, and is allowed to issue Federal reserve notes based on the collateral. The result is an increase in the currency to the amount of the loan. This is expansion of the currency. If it goes too far, it becomes inflation of the currency; but at least the transaction results in taking liquid assets and putting them into fixed capital, where they lose their liquid form, and in doing this you have perverted the Federal Reserve System.

The only way to get relief is to produce a large amount and to save what you are going to expand in the war. It does absolutely no good to issue long-term securities and draw capital goods away from the commercial banks and away from industries that must have them to perform war functions. When we get the people to save, when people do not consume as much as they did before, and, in addition, if we can stimulate them to produce more, then we get the margin that we must have for the terrible extravagance of war.

The theory of the Federal reserve notes was that they were issued against self-liquidating notes arising from commercial transactions. When the transaction ended the notes were paid. In the case supposed, the funds go into a power plant, and they come out over a long series of years in profits. Notes of this kind are not self-liquidating. The Federal reserve banks were not intended for long-term investments. They were not organized to help fund capital issues, to have their funds locked up in long-term obligations. The intention was to limit their transactions and their currency to the amount of business done in short-time commercial turnovers.

The proposition to use farm-loan bonds as security for rediscounts with the Federal reserve bank was turned down as unsound. I resisted it to the last, but I was finally convinced that it was unsound. There are now outstanding one and a quarter billions of Federal reserve notes, with a 66 per cent gold reserve. These issues can be increased about two billions more and have a 40 per cent reserve, a safe currency. To issue this additional amount for long-term investment purposes is unsound, and inflation of a dangerous character will result.

The resources of the Federal reserve banks are very limited. They were not intended to loan large sums. They were intended to mobilize the liquid capital of the country and to form the basis for a sound currency.

Now, there is English authority for new issues of capital. It has been done in an unofficial way. There has been a committee formed by the Government without sanction from Parliament, and they supervise the issues of all new capital stock and bonds; but there is no English authority for the rest of this bill as it is proposed. There is no English authority for issuing $4,000,000,000 of bonds and hooking it on the banks of England's currency system. The issue of credit in the issuing of bank bonds or Federal reserve notes increases the price of all notes and is inflation to that amount, and if we continue on this course we shall inevitably come to grief.

I received in the mail after I commenced my remarks a letter from the Association for an Equitable Federal Income Tax, dated February 21 and signed by Benjamin C. Marsh, executive secretary. I ask that it be printed as a part of my remarks. I will not read it at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

ASSOCIATION FOR AN EQUITABLE FEDERAL INCOME TAX,
New York, February 21, 1918.

To Members of Congress.

GENTLEMEN: There is still opportunity to prevent the inflation, high prices, and consequent hard times which would result from the policy of financing the war adopted in the last revenue bill. That was not a partisan measure. Both parties were, and are, equally responsible therefor.

By promptly amending the war-revenue act of October 3, 1917, through imposing heavy taxes upon excess profits and large incomes and a moderate tax upon the privilege of holding land, Congress can convince the American people that it comprehends and approves the principles for which we entered the war.

The President, the Speaker of the House, and many administration officials have urged that at least half the cost of the war should be met by current taxation. The National Grange, the American Federation of Labor, the National Nonpartisan League, and numerous other important labor and farmer organizations have demanded such conscription of wealth as would make it possible to do so.

The privileged classes of our country, however, pulled off an unjust but successful strike against democracy in war time, and won. We are paying less than one-quarter of the cost of the war by taxation because Congress capitulated to these strikers of great wealth.

The American people fear that privilege controls the Congress of the United States. Unless Congress shall amend the revenue bill to bring the financing of the war for current fiscal year to a 50-50 basis the people will believe that their fear is well founded.

As the war is being financed, and if monopoly is permitted to reap annually, as now, billions of unearned profits, the dollar will be worth only 50 cents within a year or so.

As the war is being financed a debt of thirty to forty billions will be placed upon the working people of this country, if it should last for two or three years, with annual interest charges of close to a billion and a half.

The enormous unearned fortunes and incomes resulting from this war constitute nearly as grave a menace to democracy, after Kaiserism in Germany is defeated, as that Kaiserism does to-day. We must remove both menaces.

Gentlemen of the Congress, the American people ask, "Will you now cooperate to make the world safe for democracy or will you continue to obstruct that effort?" Upon your action depends the result of next fall's election, for you can not fool all the American people all the time, not even any large proportion of the people.

Yours, truly,

BENJAMIN C. MARSH,
Executive Secretary.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] yesterday called our attention to the tremendous increase in the currency of this country. I want to add a little to the figures he gave. In 1896 the per capita circulation was $22. Just before we passed the Federal reserve act in 1913 it was $35. February 1, 1918, it was $47.23. The per capita circulation has more than doubled in this country since 1896, in the space of 22 years.

Mr. President, I hope that I have not been too vehement in what I have said. My chief design in speaking was to call the attention of the Senate to the very unusual features of this bill so that they will be discussed. I hope they will be discussed. If they are discussed at length and each Senator makes up his mind for himself, I am sure we will get a sounder bill.

I wish to say now, whatever the Senate decides to pass as a bill I am going to vote for, but I hope that the worse features of the bill will be eliminated.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not wholly approve of the bill now under discussion. But I shall vote for it. It seems essential to the conditions with which the Treasury Department is now confronted, and because any other system of proposed relief would, in my judgment, after considerably more extended discussion than this bill will receive, be rejected.

If I understand the genesis of this bill and the objects which it seeks to accomplish, it is, due to the financial starvation of many industrial concerns, and is designed, or if not designed will result, in the further mobilization of credit, which through the agency of this proposed war finance corporation will materialize in an increased issue of currency, subject to either direct or indirect taxation, that might well be avoided through the adoption of some other system. That the bill will cause added inflation is a self-evident proposition.

But, Mr. President, in times of war inflation can no more be avoided than fighting can be avoided if the war is conducted upon lines conducive to victory. In war the demand for men and for material is abnormal, and, of course, the demand for public money is abnormal. In war business is active and enjoys a feverish prosperity. In war the needs of a nation require the exercise of extraordinary effort, both toward production and consumption, and consequently abnormal conditions are necessarily substituted for those of peace.

No war has ever been prosecuted during the past 500 years which has not disturbed business, caused resort to various mobilizations of credit, and compelled the issue of currency representing that credit, whether covered or uncovered, and generally the latter.

For men to shrink from the term "inflation" and dread its coming at a time like this is to refuse to recognize the inevitable evils of war. You must mobilize credit and you can not do so without causing inflation. It may not find expression in added issues of money, but it is sure to be reflected in rising prices and in scarcity of labor. There is an invasion of the labor market with every soldier who is enlisted and sent to the front. There is an actual scarcity of labor, in fact; but the effect upon production finds expression in higher prices, and as prices increase money diminishes in value, whether the amount in circulation be increased or not, because of the necessary expansion of credit which finds substitutes for actual money if the circulation remains stationary.

This bill is said to be one designed to prevent undue inflation. My recollection is that the Secretary of the Treasury announced before the committee that one of its purposes was the prevention of inflation, which some of us questioned. He then stated that it was to prevent undue inflation. What is or is not undue inflation depends upon the necessities and the resources of the Government in times of war. If inflation to the extent of billions of dollars is essential for the preservation of our institutions, if it is necessary to enable the Government to perform its duty and accomplish the purposes and objects of the war, which are victory, then the amount of it, however pernicious, must be a secondary consideration. Hence the fact that this bill will result in inflation has no terrors for me. I do object, however, to the manner of it, for it imposes an unnecessary burden upon the taxpayers and consumers of the country.

I have said, Mr. President, that this bill is designed to mobilize the remaining credits of the country, by which I mean those credits, which do not now have access to the banks and which can not now be converted by the banks into Federal bank notes for circulation. The bill expressly says so, and while Federal reserve issues, now limited to two and a half billion dollars, as the maximum of Federal reserve issues, shall soon reach and then be compelled to pass that limitation, provided this war continues, as I fear it will, for the next 12 or 18 months.

The wisdom of the committee, the experiences of the Federal Reserve Board, and the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury have culminated in this bill. It was amended in some degree, perhaps in some very important particulars, by the committee before reporting it back to the Senate.

Mr. President, my principal objection to this bill is the roundabout way in which it proposes to deal with the subject. Another is the fact that we seek to meet this problem of inflation by imposing expense both upon the Government and those who are to receive relief under the bill.

I know it is heterodox in this body at this time for me to give expression to my own view upon the subject. Nevertheless I do not hesitate to do so. I believe that the time is rapidly coming, and we should recognize it, when the Government must issue its Treasury notes bearing no interest in exchange for its obligations, based upon the credit of the Nation and circulating as legal tender, just as the $346,000,000 of Treasury notes now in existence—and happily never destroyed—have always circulated. That is inflation; there is no question about it; yet what is this bill but a taxed inflation, cumbrous and expensive, cumbrous in execution, and materially increasing the burdens of those who need the relief it proposes to extend?

Mr. President, I know of no nation engaged in this war which has not been compelled to resort in some form to the issue of uncovered paper. I know of none which have officially suspended specie payments. I do not know that any of them will actually suspend specie payments. I have a statement, which I have unfortunately mislaid, showing the amount of added paper currency in the circulation of Great Britain, France, Italy, and Germany since the commencement of the war. Perhaps it is not necessary to be specific. Suffice it, therefore, to say that the figures mount into the billions of dollars in every one of these nations. Of course the inflation in Russia is beyond the comprehension of man. It never will be redeemed, it never can be redeemed, and in all probability the same is largely true of the issues of the other militant nations.

The plan has this advantage, however, which I know will be challenged, that it imposes no tax upon the people, but is given the same circulation which the normal peace currency receives, subject, of course, to that decrease in purchasing power which always comes either through the inflation of credit or currency or both.

Now we shall pass this bill. I am no prophet, neither am I the son of a prophet, but I venture the prediction that within a twelve month from now we shall be compelled to resort to that power which the Supreme Court of the United States has vindicated in several decisions and to which we turned in the days of the Civil War for the preservation of the Republic. We could never have won that war but for the mobilization of the credit of the people through a circulating legal tender, noninterest-bearing Treasury note.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. Do I understand the Senator from Colorado to assert that England, France, Italy, or Germany has issued direct treasury notes or fiat money?

Mr. THOMAS. I am not prepared to say that they have, for paper circulation there emanates from the Government banks by the authority of the Government. It is practically the same thing. Their currency has been necessarily increased, and with us it is the promise of the Government and not of private institutions that must do it.

Mr. KELLOGG. If I may be permitted to make a suggestion to the Senator, while there has been the greatest inflation in Germany of the four nations, Germany's gold reserve has more than doubled since the war commenced.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; and ours has more than quadrupled, yet we are inflating the currency by this bill, and we have been in the war less than a year.

Now, I do not refer, Mr. President, to this method of relieving the situation as the best one, because it is not. Unless it is carefully safeguarded it is bound to result in great disaster. But I do not perceive the nonexistence of a single condition which was not present during the Civil War just before the issue, when the policy was denounced far more vigorously than inflation has been or will be denounced in the consideration of this bill.

It is coming if the war continues, because every issue of bonds will be more and more difficult to dispose of. That is the experience of every nation, including our own during the days when we were engaged in issuing bonds in the War between the States.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. If I remember correctly—and I have personal knowledge of the matter—I think during the Civil War gold went to 240 at one time.

Mr. THOMAS. My impression was that it went higher than that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I know it went that high, because I had a little transaction, a very small one, at one time during the war.

Mr. THOMAS. I have no doubt that on the market—it was then a marketable commodity at 240.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] suggests to me that it went to 265.

Mr. THOMAS. I thought it had gone to $3. But, Mr. President, there are other methods than the stock market for testing the value of gold. Gold is now depreciating, if we judge the value by its purchasing power. A gold dollar is beautiful and brilliant and yellow, but it will not buy any more of the necessities of life than our paper dollars, whether covered by a gold reserve or not. Yet gold is appreciating, for all nations are hoarding it. They part with as little as possible.

As the war continues the nations will more and more hoard their gold. Our own Government has recently placed some sort of an embargo upon the exportation of gold. Every nation becomes a coward when its gold reserve is threatened and hides what it has; and as that policy continues, while quotations will not appear upon the exchanges, gold will be more and more valuable as time passes. If we could escape inflation, of course we should do it, but the steady decrease of the gold current in the channels of trade serve to stimulate the inevitable inflation.

I was about to say when interrupted that we will experience difficulty in the sale of the next issue of bonds, and experience more difficulty in the second successive issue of bonds. The burden of the difficulty will be progressive, and the reason is obvious.

I want to say to my friend the junior Senator from New Hampshire that he may pile taxation upon taxation upon people for the purpose of securing the needful money for the carrying on of this war, but he will fail in his object, for taxes are like tariffs—there is a point beyond which they cease to be very productive and there is a point where they become prohibitive. This war is a war of waste, as are all other wars. It is a war of tremendous expense, as are all other wars. It has all the volcanic forces of an earthquake in its effect upon social and political and economic conditions. We can not judge it or meet it from the standpoint of our normal experience. We must meet it from the standpoint of what it is and what it requires. It requires every ounce of gold, every ounce of credit, and every ounce of economy exercised by every one of the 100,000,000 of our people if we are to win it, and win it we must.

Therefore, to my mind there is no need of blinking at inflation. It is coming; it is here. It began before war was declared through an inflation of credit consequent upon the business which this country received from the allies for war equipment.

Mr. President, I shall not at this time attempt to enter into a consideration of the policy of an unsecured issue, because we are not now face to face with it. It would be beside the discussion. But I want to refer to some of the arguments of my friend, the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], with whom I am almost always in accord, but with whom I am compelled to differ somewhat on this occasion. I do not think the contrast which the Senator has offered between the farm-loan system of banks and this bill is an apt one. The purpose of the farm-loan bank act was to establish a permanent governmental policy, through the exercise of which cheap and easy money could be furnished to men engaged in agriculture on extremely long time. The bill had my hearty support. I think it is one of the best pieces of legislation which has been placed upon the statute books since I have been a Member of this body. But this bill is designed to meet and tide the Nation over what seems to be a rapidly approaching crisis. It is temporary in its character, and must be as extraordinary as the situation which demands it. To draw a parallel or a contrast between an act designed to establish and perpetuate a wise system whereby farmers may be accommodated as is the merchant in time of peace and a bill of this sort which finds its only possible justification in the imperious necessity of the hour is neither illuminating nor instructive. We can not compare it with anything except those other acts of legislation enacted since the war and those which will inevitably confront us before this session is over.

Neither do I think, Mr. President, that we would be either wise or just to carry our power of taxation to the extreme point for which the Senator contends. To my mind we are already raising more money by taxation than is fair to the people who pay it or to the Government which exacts it. It is far more approximate to our expenditures than the revenues of any other nation engaged in the war.

I do not like the revenue act of 1917 a bit more than the Senator from New Hampshire, but I criticize it upon other than the grounds which appeal to him. I think that the act is a confused kaleidoscopic jumble of contradictions of tax requirements which are neither logical nor just. If the bill as reported to the Senate by the committee had been enacted, or if it had been the model for the bill actually enacted, we would have raised more money by it and we would have been more just to the taxpayer and far more scientific in our legislation. As it is, we have evolved an act which in my judgment is a reflection upon congressional intelligence.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GERRY in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the junior Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. HOLLIS. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me to say that while he does not agree in my conclusion about the bill, I thoroughly agree with him in his conclusion.

Mr. THOMAS. I am very glad then that we are not entirely apart.

Mr. President, I had some part in framing the bill, as did my very dear friend the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], which was first reported to this body last year. The income-tax provisions were then raised very considerably higher indeed than I thought was just. The war tax—that is to say the tax upon war profits as such—was not as high as I thought it should be, but it was levied upon war profits; and the junior Senator from New Hampshire very aptly said the only thing left in the law concerning war profits is the title to subdivision 2. We have placed a tax upon excess profits, so called, which consists of all the taxpayer makes whether he made it before the war or since the war or both, over and above a percentage, as I recall, of 7 per cent upon capital, which is so rigidly limited by definition that if a man borrows money to carry on his business he is not permitted to count it as capital in determining the percentage to be deducted from the amount upon which his tax is levied.

Moreover, Mr. President, the small-profit man is taxed far more heavily, relatively speaking, than the man whose income is enormous That provision, for instance, of the act which places a flat tax of 8 per cent upon all incomes in excess of $6,000, no matter from what source it comes, no matter how it be derived, unless it be derived from investment of idle capital, which it exempts, is about as iniquitous a piece of legislation as Congress has ever enacted, and its widespread and far-reaching injustice will, I think, bring us many telegrams and letters of protest when the time for actual payments draws near.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. I suppose the Senator from Colorado knows that neither House of Congress passed that provision; that it was a pure piece of legislation by the conference committee.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, the Senator means they did not originally pass upon it. They had to pass upon it when they enacted the law. But I know how that was done. The bill came back here from the conference committee just in advance of the time fixed for final adjournment. Nobody read it or had time to read it, and the bill must either pass or fail for that particular session, and so it was put through.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Before leaving the city last summer on account of illness the Senate committee distinctly and definitely voted down that proposition in the committee.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was very much surprised to learn afterwards that it was in the law.

Mr. THOMAS. That is true.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have offered a proposed amendment repealing that provision of the law, which is, I suppose, quietly resting in the room of the Committee on Finance. I think we ought to take that up at some time. I agree with the Senator that it was utterly illogical and iniquitous.

Mr. THOMAS. And I have introduced a substitute for the whole title. I left the Senate very shortly after the Senator from New Hampshire, and for the same reason; but, after reading that act, I thought Providence would have been extremely kind to the country if it had eliminated every member of the Finance Committee by illness, thus sparing it the infliction of this law. The Senator and I must congratualte each other that we were too ill to be here to vote for that measure. If we had been present we probably would have voted for it, just as the other Senators did, on the eve of adjournment. Rather than see the bill fail, we might have given it our reluctant support.

Mr. President, while I am on this subject let me say something else: I am unable to see any justification for the definition of excess profits which this bill gives to surplus revenue. If John Smith made $50,000 before the war and is making $50,000 since the war, which is more than 7 per cent upon his capital, how can it be called an excess profit? If a gold mine—and gold is the only thing for which a producer receives just so much for his product, neither more nor less—were producing $100,000 in 1913 and 1914, and is producing a million dollars in 1917 because of the fortunate discovery of another body of gold ore, that is not excess profit and can not be. I do not think that it is either natural, logical, or just to place a large tax upon a man's income and an additional large tax upon the same thing because the law defines it as excess profit.

On the other hand, the extraordinary profit made by many in consequence of the war furnishes a very natural and just source of Government income. The tax on it does not touch the normal income as measured by the past; it leaves a goodly portion of the extraordinary profit to the beneficiary and takes the remainder for the Government. It is the only additional tax, in my judgment, which can be assessed in large percentages upon the business of the country which will not disturb it. That has been the policy in England and it has worked splendidly. We have been told to avoid her mistakes. Would to God we had the sense to follow her wise example whenever it is disclosed.

Mr. President, if the revenue law had been enacted as it was originally reported here, it would, in my judgment, have produced a larger revenue than it will as now framed, with less business disturbance, and it would have been robbed entirely of that sense of injustice which every man must feel who pays the extraordinary tax it imposes. We are raising something like $4,000,000,000 as estimated upon this law. I think if we should increase it 50 per cent or 25 per cent we would not raise as much, but we would practically paralyze the great productive industries of the country. As one member of the committee said during one of our discussions, you can not rob a man and then borrow money from him; and yet that is precisely what we have by this law attempted to do. Our income tax is the highest in the world. When to that you add this excess-profits tax, it is the highest tax, in my judgment, that exists anywhere, and the most indefensible.

I want to tax wealth; I believe in doing that; but I think that, as it is imposed, by this law we have placed upon wealth a heavier burden than is either fair or just. We must have sources of revenue or all the revenue bills on earth will prove barren in their results. In order to get revenue, taxes should be so assessed as to interfere as little as possible with the ordinary pursuits of men.

I believe, too, Mr. President, that every generation should bear its own expenses, whether they be those of war or those of peace, but I am unable to subscribe to the doctrine that in times of war the entire burden of expense must be borne by taxpayers while the war is on. Some of it should be postponed to years of peace and prosperity, the taxes to be so distributed as that the burden can be met, as every other great burden is met, in installments that are fairly just and that do the least amount of economic disturbance.

Mr. President, I want also here to record my testimony to the very liberal way in which wealth has responded to our bond issues. I do not think it is just to say that the wealth of this country has been niggardly or backward in its subscription. I am no defender of wealth, particularly that unjust wealth, that oppressive wealth, which is the subject of so much discussion and of so much denunciation—I have indulged in both many times—but fairness and common justice require an acknowledgment that in bearing its part of the burden of this war wealth has done magnificently.

It has come to the front with a willingness and liberality that excites my most hearty and unalloyed appreciation, and I have no question that it will continue, just as the rest of us will, to the extent of its ability to subscribe to the loans of the Government every cent that can be spared; yet, as I have before stated, the time is coming when the raising of interest rates, necessary as that may be, will not enable us to continue to market our immense bond issues at par.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] spoke of the effect of an increased rate of bond interest upon the savings banks depositors of the country. The deduction which he makes seems to be a natural one, and yet, if my information is not incorrect, the actual effect of the raising of the interest rate upon bonds during the Civil War did not result in any great depletion of the deposits in the savings banks of the country. A man who is accustomed to hoard his savings and put them in a savings bank, who has made that his practice for years, is not apt to remove them, no matter what the temptation in other and strange directions. The fact that some of our bonds have fallen below their par value would necessarily cause apprehension and anxiety to the average savings depositor, the loss of any amount of whose deposits or fluctuations in the value of his security would arouse his lively apprehension.

There is another source, I was going to say, of revenue; another policy which we might well consider and apply in these times which would very sensibly increase the funds of the Government, so necessary to the prosecution of this war. If this Congress could be induced to institute a policy of economy in appropriations, reducing our average normal expenses wherever possible, repudiating all new enterprises and governmental functions not absolutely essential to the prosecution of the war, and holding down the normal expenditures of the Government to the lowest possible level, at the same time jealously and vigilantly inspecting the expenses of the great departments, and exposing their extravagances wherever apparent, the result would be millions upon millions of dollars saved which the Government would have at its disposal but which now will, in a large degree, be wasted. I do not hope for any such consummation. I see no signs of it. Yet that phase of our duties is quite as important as is the enactment of a bill like this and similar ones demanded by the business interests of the country.

Mr. President, I shall not discuss any particular provision of this measure, with the exception of that to which the attention of the chairman of the committee was directed just before the adjournment day before yesterday. I refer to subsection (d), which is found on page 9 of section 6 of the bill. It will be noticed that that part of the bill which refers to the subject matter of relief to corporations independent of the medium of the banks has been entirely rewritten. It is one of the most important features of the bill; I think the committee gave to it as serious consideration as it gave to any other part of the bill, and perhaps more than it gave to the remainder of the bill as a whole.

The purpose of it is to give the war finance corporation authority in extraordinary cases to make advances directly to certain semipublic corporations contributing to the success of the war and unable to obtain relief from any other source. I confess that I am not satisfied with the phrascology which we have adopted, but I must also state that it is practically impossible to frame the section so that it will meet the wishes and the purposes of the committee as a whole and at the same time be free from a possible ambiguity, thus necessitating construction which might result in undue liberality of relief.

There are, however, many corporations engaged in pursuits which are semipublic, pursuits which in my opinion should never have been delegated to private hands, but which, nevertheless, are there, and whose continued operation is more or less essential to our war purposes—corporations engaged in the production of electric current and its distribution; corporations engaged in urban transportation, which is necessary now more than ever to transport workmen to and from their homes; corporations engaged in the supply of water to large communities. Some of those corporations are confronted with the early maturity of their bond issues, or some of them.

The liquid capital of the Nation has disappeared in the face of the public demand for money; the market for securities is practically wiped out; the banks have advanced money upon liberty bonds and in aid of their regular customers to the extent of their ability; and the question or one of the questions which confront us and which this bill is designed to meet is whether the Government under these circumstances should come to the relief of such of these corporations as are able to furnish adequate security for the accommodation demanded. If it be necessary, Mr. President, to advance money as provided under paragraphs b and c of the section, it seems to me to be a self-evident proposition that it may become more necessary to come to the relief of this class of business, unless it be that if they go into the hands of receivers the operations of their business and of their productive capacity will be limited or will disappear.

I believe that if any of them should be placed in the hands of a receiver because of their inability to meet their obligations the Government would not suffer directly, because the business would go on; but the danger lies in the effect upon the public credit of the sudden transfer of going concerns into the hands of receivers at this time for winding up and dissolution. We must keep our credit good—and when I say "our credit" I mean the general credit of the people, and especially those engaged in the work of the war—to the extent of our ability.

It is true that many of these corporations have been overcapitalized; it is equally true that many of them have been overbonded.

A Senator on this side of the Chamber told me the other day that the cost of the trolley company operating in his little city was $100,000, but that the bond issue had been swelled to $400,000, and the bonds had been floated. I do not think the Government should aid such a concern; the sooner it is wound up and readjusted the better it will be for the stockholders, for the community, and for the corporation; so I would like this section better if we were able to frame it in such wise as to exclude from its operations those concerns which have abused their corporate privileges and capitalized not only the existing business but the future in the undue issue either of bonds or of watered stock, and I shall, before the bill is submitted to a final vote, attempt to meet that condition, if possible, by an appropriate amendment.

I think, Mr. President, that the word "adequate," as has been suggested, should also be inserted before the word "security," on page 10, line 3, of this bill. As it now reads the board may extend relief to corporations of this character upon such terms and upon such security and subject to such rules, and so forth, as may be prescribed. It may be that the word "adequate" would be meaningless and possibly superfluous; yet I am satisfied that it is the duty of Congress to require, in as definite terms as possible and with as much qualification as possible, the acceptance only of such security as will safeguard the Government from loss. If we convey this power qualified by the requirement of accepting such adequate security as may be necessary, we certainly place a limitation upon the power which without that word would not appear in the statute. I do not for a moment mean to be understood as inferring that the corporation after its creation would intentionally fail to properly safeguard the Government, but they might well be induced in some extraordinary case to take chances. If we say to them, "You can only do this upon adequate security," the board will give heed to the qualifying adjective and see to it that the security is adequate. So much for subsection (d).

Mr. President, I can not leave the floor without referring to another phase of the financial situation or, to speak more properly, to another source of relief for the financial situation, which, I fear, will not be received with any great degree of warmth by this body, because I shall hark back to the old question of silver as money of redemption. Like Banquo's ghost, Mr. President, that question will not down until it is properly settled; and this war has demonstrated, as nothing else ever could, the inadequacy of our basis of redemption or absolute money. Upon the back of the gold reserves all over the world there rests a burden too great in times of peace; that burden becomes intolerable in times of war. How much more rational, how much more economical, it would be if, instead of considering extraordinary bills like this, we should enlarge the volume of our basic money, go back to the standard which prevailed for nearly a hundred years in this country, and by that means steady the inflation which we have now and that which is coming—in the end it can not be regulated otherwise. This most obvious method of relief, at present hopeless of accomplishment, is nevertheless the most sensible and, in my judgment, the most beneficial method of currency reform upon which we could embark.

As I stated at the outset, I shall vote for this bill. The administration feels that it is necessary; the committee has unanimously reported it. It is the best we can do under the circumstances. Yet, finally, after going through this valley of tribulation and resorting to many expedients for tiding our finances over the huge demands of the war, we may, I trust, come back to sober common sense, follow in the footsteps of our fathers, and restore our monetary system to the basis provided in the Constitution of our country.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator from North Carolina desire to address the Senate?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was going to ask the attention of the Senator to one phase of this bill, and ask it he can not agree with me on the proposal I am about to make. Turning to page 14, commencing on line 4 of that page, we find the language:

> No person, firm, corporation, or association shall sell, or offer for sale or for subscription, any issue, or any part of any issue, of securities hereafter issued, the par or face value of which issue shall be in excess of $100,000, except in accordance with such rules and regulations—

And so forth, of the capital issues committee. I was wondering if the Senator would insist that that language should be so all-inclusive?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; in line 6, after the word "issued," I think very likely we ought to insert the words "to such persons, firms, or corporations."

Mr. WADSWORTH. My point is, Mr. President, that that language would prevent, except by the consent of the capital issues committee, not only the issuance and sale of securities in the inauguration of new enterprises, but would also prevent the issue or sale or subscription to securities which are issued simply for the purpose of changing the method of ownership of a going concern. That, I assume, is not the intention of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is not the intention of the bill. It is not intended to affect a going concern except as to new issues.

Mr. WADSWORTH. As to new issues; yes. But, as will be seen, this language does not confine itself to new issues; it says "any issue." As an example——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. As an example, if the Senator will allow me to try to illustrate my thought, it often happens that a man who has been conducting an active business for a generation, as he grows older desires to retire from business, yet he does not want to lose all interest in the business which he has built up. It often happens that men in that position incorporate their business, a business already existing, and invite subscriptions from some of their friends to take a portion of that stock, retaining some of it themselves. A transaction of that character could not be completed; and I assure the Senator that there must be thousands and thousands of transactions of that and similar kinds. Such a transaction does not involve any new borrowing; it does not involve the inauguration of any new enterprise whatsoever; yet a transaction of that kind can not be completed under this language without the consent of the capital issues committee. My suggestion is that in line 5, after the word "subscription," we insert the words "as a method of borrowing for capital purposes," so that it will read:

No person, firm, corporation, or association shall sell, or offer for sale or for subscription, as a method of borrowing for capital purposes, any issue, or any part of any issue, of securities—

And so forth.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator that until we have finished the committee amendments that amendment would not be in order, but if the Senator will prepare the amendment and hand it to me I will be very glad to consider it and see whether the committee can accept it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I say to the Senator from North Carolina, in just one or two sentences more—and I will not delay him nor the Senate beyond that—that on page 15 that same expression, "borrowing for capital purposes," is used in this bill as defining the kind of borrowing transactions which this bill seeks to affect; and I should like to have the two provisions, the one on page 14 and the one on page 15, made alike.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, as one matter has just been called to the attention of the Senator from North Carolina, I should like to call his attention to another matter. On page 8, beginning with line 7, this bill provides for making advances from time to time "to any savings bank or other banking institution which receives savings deposits." Of course, we can all understand how there might be in time of great stress like this large withdrawals from savings institutions, but why should savings banks and banking institutions be favored rather than building and loan associations?

Mr. SIMMONS. I tried to point out this morning that we were relieving the savings banks because the savings bank deposits were liable to be drawn upon to a dangerous extent in the present conditions for the purchase of Government securities, and in that case the savings banks would have no way of raising the money to pay off their depositors except by raising it on the securities they had purchased with the deposits. This provision is intended to enable them to meet a situation of that sort with which they are really threatened at this time.

In the case of the ordinary building and loan association they do not loan in any such way; they are not subject to a run by their stockholders. Their loans are made for the purpose of enabling the stockholders to construct buildings and homes, and I do not see how they would be subject to the danger which threatens the savings banks.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, sometimes the building and loan associations sell their stock to be paid for on the installment plan, and its purchasers can surrender that stock at any time; they are not necessarily borrowers. The situation is substantially this: All the building and loan associations seek to have their funds loaned. Now, if there should be a special demand on the part of those who have subscribed to their stock, and who are not borrowers, it is going to create such a demand upon the building and loan associations that it seems to me they ought to be cared for just the same as are the savings banks.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; but the Senator overlooks the fact that the assessments of the building and loan associations are payable at fixed times and periods. They know when they are to be paid. They know where the money is to come from to pay them. They make certain assessments, and those assessments have to be paid. They are not subject to any run at all. The savings banks, when they receive a deposit to-day, may be called upon a hour afterwards to pay out that deposit.

Mr. POMERENE. Most of the savings banks have regulations whereby they can refuse to pay out deposits until after a given length of time, even though demand is made.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not as familiar with the savings-bank system as the Senator is, but I have understood that the bulk of the deposits in the savings banks are subject to draft.

Mr. POMERENE. I am not objecting in the least to the relief which the bill grants to the savings banks, but I see no reason why building and loan associations should not be treated in the same way. I think it is necessary.

Mr. SIMMONS. Because you can not bring your building and loan associations within the principle that we apply to the savings banks, nor does the reason for which we adopt that principle apply to building and loan associations. Then, there is another phase of this matter: The Senator will remember that we have the licensing system for the express purpose of preventing investment in unnecessary things—things unnecessary to be used as applied to these war conditions. Now, one of the things that I do not think we want to encourage people to do in this situation is to build houses. Under these conditions I think if a man can possibly postpone the building of his home until after the war, it would be mighty well for him to do it. I think that is one of the sources of unnecessary expenditure. People are making a good deal of money, and naturally, having these fine incomes resulting from the high prices of labor and other things, they are tempted to take that money and invest it in a fine home. I think it would be a great deal better if they would wait until after the war, and that is one of the unnecessary expenditures that I think it is the purpose of one of the sections of this bill to discourage.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I agree that there ought not to be any unnecessary building; but we have just heard of very large appropriations for the purpose of building houses for workingmen in different localities, and in places of that character there will be very great demands on these building and loan associations.

It does not necessarily follow because a man makes a loan that he is therefore going to build a house. His house may already be built. It may be that it is for the purpose of taking up an old mortgage on a building that is already up and occupied, or for some other reason, and they make these loans at the building and loan associations.

I confess that I see no reason whatever for this distinction between the two. I do not think there is a sound reason.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I can see absolutely no reason why building and loan associations should be included. On the contrary, I believe that if we were to include building and loan associations not engaged in war work, we ought to include every institution in this country.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VARDAMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will not the Senator differentiate between mutual savings banks, which pay 3½ to 4 per cent interest, and building and loan associations, which pay 6 per cent interest? I will say that I am a friend of the building and loan associations, but it seems to me that there is a very wide difference on that point. In the testimony before our committee the witnesses laid great stress on the necessity of halting building operations during the war, and I know that the Federal Reserve Board is discouraging all building that can possibly wait until after the war is over.

Mr. POMERENE. Of course, I realize that there should not be unnecessary building. I see the difference between a 3½ per cent stock and one that draws 6 per cent; but, at the same time, not all of these building and loan associations pay 6 per cent on their stock. If I may say this, too, I think that if the Senator will examine into the question of the building and loan associations he will find that there is not a very great difference between the building and loan associations, as they exist in some of the States, and these so-called savings banks.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I have not looked into that matter. I simply take up the newspapers of Washington and find that they are offering stock at 6 per cent.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, yes; that may be.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what they are paying here; and I thought likely that was the rate throughout the country, or approximately the rate throughout the country.

Mr. POMERENE. I may offer an amendment later on dealing with that matter.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether or not the Committee on Finance has considered, as a means of protecting the savings banks of the country, a method by which money borrowed by the United States on its bonds should carry an interest charge not exceeding 4 per cent, or not exceeding the common rate of the savings banks?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that the committee has not considered that question. It has not been even mooted or suggested in any way to the committee.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to say, Mr. President, that everyone will have observed that the 3½ per cent bonds, which are not taxable, have maintained practically a par value—within just a cent or two of par value—while the 4 per cent bonds, bearing a higher rate of interest, but which are taxable, have gone down

4 or as much as 5 per cent on one occasion, I believe. There is, therefore, some question as to the policy which we ought to pursue in protecting the rate of interest which is to be charged in the United States; and it seems to me that it would be better to pursue a policy under which these bonds would not be taxable, and under which we certainly would not exceed a 4 per cent rate. If we can get the money at 3½ per cent, we ought to do that, and not have the bonds taxable, rather than to have the bonds go up to 4½ per cent and then have the United States in active competition with the savings banks and leave the depositors of the savings banks, who have thousands of millions on deposit, to be encouraged to withdraw their savings from the savings banks for investment in Government bonds. If we do that, we may cause a very serious disturbance in the settled financial structure of this country, and I think the Senate ought to have that clearly in mind in connection with this bill and in connection with the future policy in raising funds for carrying on the governmental operations in this war.

There is one other suggestion which I should like to make with regard to the control of the issues of new stocks. I think it is a very extraordinary thing, of course, to give to any committee not named by the President of the United States or not approved by the Senate of the United States the right to exercise such an enormous power at all. It would seem to be almost unavoidable, under the circumstances, that such power should be placed somewhere in order to protect the Government's requirements in the matter of funds; but I observe that the bill as it has been drawn contains no method of appeal in case of some denial, and I do not believe we ought to leave the business men of the country feeling that the arbitrary power will be placed in the hands of any board or any committee from which there would be no appeal whatever. Men who have power, where there is no appeal from it, sometimes, by reason of the frailty of human nature, exercise that power in rather an arbitrary and almost tyrannical spirit, and I think we ought to have such an enormous power exercised with great moderation and with great caution and with reservation. I do not think we ought to leave this bill without providing some means of appeal against a board that should exercise the power of saying to men that they shall not issue securities for carrying on what men believe to be their legitimate business.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GERRY in the chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does not the Senator from Oklahoma think it would be much wiser for Congress to limit the rate of interest to 4 per cent and leave the bonds taxable?

Mr. OWEN. I do.

Mr. KELLOGG. It seems to me to be a great mistake to issue eighteen or twenty or thirty billions of bonds the income from which will be subject to no taxes. I do not believe it is necessary to raise the rate of interest to sell those bonds, and I am very sure it would be very disastrous to the savings banks of this country.

Mr. OWEN. I think the rate of interest ought not to go beyond 4 per cent; and if it is necessary to have those bonds nontaxable in order to keep down the rate, I think that ought to be done. I do not believe we ought to permit the rate to go above 4 per cent, and to that extent certainly I am in accord with the Senator. I think these bonds will sell at 3½ per cent, nontaxable.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have not any doubt about it.

Mr. OWEN. The fact that the nontaxable 3½ per cent bonds have a better standing in the market than the taxable 4 per cent bonds I think quite clearly demonstrates that, because those transactions have been going on upon a very large scale.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, when the Senator asked me a little while ago a question with reference to whether the Finance Committee had had under consideration the matter of fixing the rate of interest on these bonds, I assumed that he had reference to a future issue of bonds not covered by the present authorization. Of course, the Finance Committee has heretofore reported a measure carrying a definite rate, to wit, the 4 per cent rate; but that applies only to the issue authorized in that act. We have not yet discussed in the Finance Committee any rate for any future authorization of bond issues.

Mr. KELLOGG. It was the future authorization that I referred to. Congress ought to limit it to 4 per cent.

Mr. OWEN. I, of course, was referring to the future, not to the past. I am acquainted with the existing statute.

Mr. SIMMONS. I just wanted to make it clear that my answer referred to future bond issues.

Mr. OWEN. But in this case even the particular bonds that are being authorized to be issued by this corporation have no amount of interest fixed in them. To all intents and purposes this corporation is a Government bank, receiving deposits from the Treasury of the United States to the extent of $500,000,000, and then having the right—it being a governmental institution, manned by the Secretary of the Treasury and those chosen by the President to cooperate with him—to issue bonds to the extent of four thousand millions. If those bonds, amounting to four thousand millions, have no limitation fixed upon the rate of interest, obviously they may come in conflict with the savings banks in like manner. To all intents and purposes these are Government bonds. They are just as much Government bonds, morally and ethically, as if they were issued by the Government of the United States directly; and I think we ought to put a fixed limit upon the rate of interest carried by these bonds, so that they shall not come in competition with the savings banks of this Nation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator that undoubtedly they will be very short-term bonds. They would not issue long-term bonds.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; they will be short-term bonds, but they will be sufficient to withdraw deposits from the savings banks. That is the danger which I think we ought to try to avoid.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is right.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think the chairman of the committee will agree with me that there has been a pretty broad suggestion made that in view of the financial condition existing, and which may be made even more exacting in the future, the next issue is likely to be at 4½ per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have heard the suggestion that probably that might be the rate; but there has been no official statement about it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no.

Mr. SIMMONS. There has been no discussion in the committee about it.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; and on that point, if the Senator will permit me a word, representing a State which is deeply interested in the mutual savings-bank system, I have had great anxiety about the possibility of the rate being higher than is being paid in New England, which is in many cases 3½ and in other cases 4 per cent. I have had much anxiety about what effect it will have on the savings-bank system.

Mr. SIMMONS. With reference to the rate of interest upon these particular bonds, both the rate of interest and the time of maturity, subject to the five-year limit, are left to the director of the corporation, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury has very much to do with fixing the rate of interest upon the Government bonds, and he will have very much to do with fixing the rate of interest upon these bonds. That money is to be loaned to the industrial corporations of the country; and in making loans—for that is what it is—to the business interests of the country, I do not suppose the Government would want to prescribe a very low rate of interest; probably not as low a rate of interest as is fixed upon its own bonds. In the one case the Government is to pay the interest, and in the other case the interest is to be paid to the Government.

Mr. OWEN. The question which the Senator refers to there, as to the disposition of the money after the money shall have been raised by these bonds, is one thing, and the rate to be fixed upon the bond is another thing. The rate which is to be fixed upon these bonds is left in the hands of the board of directors of this war finance corporation; and they might put it at 6 per cent, and they might withdraw from the savings banks of this country thousands of millions of dollars, and break them to pieces. We assume, of course that they would not do a thing that would be notably injurious; but when the legislative branch is discharging its function of protecting the interests of the country, I think it would be wise to limit the rate of interest on those bonds.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator was talking about one thing and I was talking about another. The Senator was talking about the rate of interest upon the bonds. I thought the Senator was talking at that time about the rate of interest to be charged by the corporation when it loans money.

Mr. OWEN. Yes. Well, I was pointing out that the Senator was speaking of one thing and I was speaking of another; but I think that this bill ought to fix the rate of interest on these proposed loans so that the rate of interest will not be permitted to interfere with the savings banks of the country.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Otherwise, if the Senator will permit me, the very object of the bill—which is to stabilize the industrial and commercial situation—will be defeated, because if they withdraw these deposits from the savings banks in great quantities they must withdraw their accommodations from their customers, and the very situation which we have started out to remedy we have really put in about as bad a position as we could.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, it is even much worse than the Senator points out, because it is perfectly notorious that since the war took place the securities of the savings banks have suffered a depreciation so severe that the Comptroller of the Currency has been obliged to make a ruling that there should be no charging down of those sound securities because of the market depreciation, because ultimately they will come back, because they are all right; but the market value of the securities has diminished, and if the savings banks were compelled to sell their securities upon this market it would be extremely dangerous to them.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I think the bill itself furnishes evidence as to what is the basis of fixing the rate of interest—not in express terms, but inferentially. We fix the rate of interest in a modified way on loans made to savings banks by providing that the rate of interest charged on those loans shall be at least one-half of 1 per cent in excess of the rate fixed by the Federal reserve bank upon 90-day commercial paper.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator is again addressing himself to a different subject from the one under discussion.

Mr. SIMMONS. I know I am; but I am saying to the Senator that that indicates the thought in the mind of the draftsman and the thought in the mind of the legislature when it adopts that provision, with reference to the same subject matter.

Mr. OWEN. That deals with the disposition of the funds after they shall have been obtained and not with the rate of interest on the funds when they are being obtained; and that is entirely different, of course.

Mr. SIMMONS. Possibly the Senator and myself are mixed again on what we are talking about.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator can speak for himself.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the tremendous importance of the point to which the Senator from Oklahoma has called attention is found in the fact, as I have gleaned the figures from the last report of the Comptroller of the Currency, that the total deposits of State, savings, private banks, and loan and trust companies in 1917 were $16,768,060,159.14. That is, the savings in the entire country were over $16,000,000,000.

Now we will come to the mutual savings banks, in which my part of the country is more particularly interested. There are in the mutual savings banks of the country $4,422,489,384.42. The importance of protecting these banks is found in a couple of illustrations which I will give.

For instance, my own little State, with 420,000 or 430,000 people in it, has 46 mutual savings banks, and there are 206,590 depositors, almost one-half of the entire population of the State.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And those mutual savings banks are not profit-making affairs. There is no money to be made on them.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not at all. Their deposits are $105,764,673.14, being an average deposit of $511.95, showing that it is the working people who are putting their money in these banks.

Take Massachusetts: There are 196 banks, with 2,566,467 depositors, which I think is about 70 per cent of the entire population of Massachusetts. They have $1,026,822,448.75 in deposits, being an average to each depositor of $400.09.

That runs all through the States where they have these mutual savings banks; and the average deposit in all of the States having these savings banks is $494.96.

So that the Senator has called attention to a very important matter, something that ought to be safeguarded in every possible way; and while this bill, if it shall pass as it is now written, will allow these banks to borrow money at one-half of 1 per cent—unless that is changed—above the commercial rate of 90-day paper, and that may be a sufficient protection to them, I think the interests of the savings banks ought to be considered very carefully and protected in every possible way.

Mr. President, I ask permission to put in the RECORD the table which I have prepared, covering all the States in which mutual savings banks exist, coupled with the statement that I made in the first place concerning the aggregate of savings in other banks where savings are allowed, in addition to those of the mutual savings banks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The total deposits of State, savings, private banks, and loan and trust companies in 1917 were $16,768,060,159.14.

Mutual savings banks, June 20, 1917.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if no other Senator desires to speak on the bill, I ask that the committee amendments be taken up for action upon them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the first amendment of the committee.

The first amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 1, page 2, line 14, after the word "its," to strike out "affairs" and insert "affairs" with a comma, so as to make the section read:

That for the purpose of affording financial assistance, either directly or indirectly, to persons, firms, corporations, and associations whose operations are necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, in cases where such persons, firms, corporations, or associations shall be unable to procure funds on reasonable or practicable terms from the general public or through the regular banking channels, and for the purpose of regulating and controlling the sale and offering for sale or subscription of securities hereafter issued, and for other purposes in aid of the prosecution of the war, the Secretary of the Treasury, together with four additional persons (who shall be the directors first appointed as hereinafter provided), are hereby created a body corporate and politic in deed and in law by the name, style, and title of the "War Finance Corporation" (herein called the Corporation), and shall have succession for a period of 10 years, provided that in no event shall the corporation exercise any of the powers conferred by this act, except such as are incidental to the successful liquidation of its assets and the successful winding up its affairs, after six months after the termination of the war, the date of such termination to be fixed by proclamation of the President of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 2, line 17, after the words "of the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; in line 22, after the words "of the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; and on page 3, line 4, after the words "by the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That the capital stock of the Corporation shall be $500,000,000, all of which shall be subscribed by the United States of America, and such subscription shall, upon the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, be subject to call upon the vote of three-fifths of the board of directors of the Corporation at such time or times as may be deemed advisable; and there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of making payment upon such subscription when and as called. Receipts for payments by the United States of America for or on account of such stock shall be issued by the Corporation to the Secretary of the Treasury and shall be evidence of stock ownership.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary be directed to change the first letter of the word "corporation" in all the 20 amendments to conform with the first amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 3, line 6, after the words "of the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; and in line 9, after the words "by the," to strike out "Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President of the United States. And director or directors so appointed may be removed by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, and vacancies, however arising, may be filled by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President" and insert "President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the management of the Corporation shall be vested in a board of directors consisting of the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall be chairman of the board, and four other persons, to be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Whenever a vacancy shall occur among the directors so appointed, the person appointed director to fill any such vacancy shall hold office for the unexpired term of the member whose place he is selected to fill. Three members of the board of directors shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 4, page 3, line 22, after the words "of the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That the principal office of the Corporation shall be located in the District of Columbia, but there may be established agencies or branch offices in any city or cities of the United States under rules and regulations prescribed by the board of directors, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 5, page 4, line 3, after the words "of the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 4, after the word "provided," to strike out "shall devote their entire time to the business of the corporation (except such part of their time, if any, as shall be devoted to other governmental business) and."

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, the consideration of this amendment will fairly go with the consideration of the amendment that strikes out the provision requiring these officers not to continue as officers, directors, or trustees of any other banking institution; and in view of the importance of those two amendments I will ask that they may both be passed over.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not object to that.

Mr. HOLLIS. I make the request as to this amendment and when the other amendment is reached I will make the same request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be passed over.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 4, in line 10, after the word "not," to strike out "however"; in the same line, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "the annual salary of the principal officer of an executive department of the United States" and insert "$12,000"; in line 14, after the words "from the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; in line 18, after the words "by the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; in line 19, after the words "of the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; and in line 22 before the words "shall designate," to strike out "Secretary of the Treasury" and insert "President of the United States," so as to read:

shall receive annual salaries, payable monthly, the amount of which shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President of the United States, not exceeding $12,000. Any director receiving from the United States any salary or compensation for services shall not receive as salary from the Corporation any amount which, together with any salary or compensation received from the United States, would make the total amount paid to him by the United States and by the Corporation exceed the amount fixed as the annual salary of a director of the Corporation, as hereinbefore provided. Of the four directors appointed, as hereinbefore provided, the President of the United States shall designate two to serve for two years, and two for four years; and thereafter each director so appointed shall serve for a term of four years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, in line 25, after the word "years," to strike out "No director or officer of the corporation shall continue to be an officer, director, or trustee of any other corporation or member of any firm of bankers; and, before" and insert "Any director shall be subject to removal by the President of the United States"; on page 5, line 4, before the word "entering," to insert "Before"; and in line 5, after the word "shall," to strike out "certify under oath to the Secretary of the Treasury that he has complied with this requirement, and shall also."

Mr. HOLLIS. I ask that this amendment may go over, because all these amendments are linked together.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over.

The next amendment was, in section 6, page 5, line 14, before the words "shall be," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; in line 16, after the word "make," to strike out "contract" and insert "contracts"; in line 19, before the word "complain," to insert "to"; in line 21, after the words "fix the," to strike out "compansation" and insert "compensation," so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 6. That the Corporation shall be empowered and authorized—

(a) To adopt, alter, and use a corporate seal; to make contracts; to purchase or lease and hold or dispose of such real estate as may be necessary for the prosecution of its business; to sue and be sued; to complain and defend in any court of law or equity, including courts of the United States; to appoint, by its board of directors, and fix the compensation of such officers, employees, attorneys, and agents as are not otherwise provided for in this act, to define their duties, require bonds of them and fix the penalties thereof, and to dismiss at pleasure such officers, employees, attorneys, and agents; and to prescribe, amend, and repeal, by its board of directors, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, by-laws regulating the manner in which its general business may be conducted and the privileges granted to it by law may be exercised and enjoyed, and prescribing the powers and duties of its officers and agents.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 18, after the words "by the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; in line 22, after the words "by the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; on page 7, line 2, after the words "of the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; in line 7, after the words "by the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; in line 10, after the word "The," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; in line 16, after the words "of the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; on page 8, line 2, after the words "of the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; in line 4, after the words "by the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; and in the same line, after the word "The," where it occurs the second time, to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation," so as to make the clause read:

(b) To make advances, upon such terms not inconsistent herewith, as it may prescribe for periods not exceeding five years from the respective dates of such advances, (1) to any bank, banker, or trust company which has made, and which has outstanding, any loan or loans to any person, firm, corporation, or association whose operations shall be necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war and evidenced by a note or notes, or (2) to any bank, banker, or trust company which has rendered financial assistance, directly or indirectly, to any such person, firm, corporation, or association by the purchase of its bonds or other obligations: Provided, That advances so made by the Corporation on the basis of any such loan or loans shall not exceed 75 per cent of the face value thereof: And provided, That any advances so made by the Corporation, in cases where such financial assistance shall have been rendered by the purchase of such bonds or other obligations shall not exceed 75 per cent of the market value of such bonds or other obligations at the time of such advance, as estimated and determined by the board of directors of the Corporation: And provided further, That all such advances shall be made upon the promissory note or notes of such bank, banker, or trust company, secured by the notes, bonds, or other obligations, which are the basis of any such advance by the Corporation, together with all the securities, if any, which such bank, banker, or trust company may hold as collateral for such notes, bonds, or other obligations. The Corporation shall, however, have power to make advances (a) up to 100 per cent of the face value of any such loan or loans made by any such bank, banker, or trust company to any such person, firm, corporation, or association, or (b) up to 100 per cent of the market value at the time of such advances (as estimated and determined by the board of directors of the Corporation) of such bonds or other obligations by the purchase of which financial assistance shall have been rendered to such person, firm, corporation, or association: Provided, That every such advance shall be secured in the manner described in the preceding part of this paragraph, and in addition thereto by collateral security, to be furnished by the bank, banker, or trust company, of such character as shall be prescribed by the board of directors, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, of a market value, at the time of such advance (as estimated and determined by the board of directors of the Corporation), equal to at least 25 per cent of the amount advanced by the Corporation. The Corporation shall retain power to require additional collateral security at any time.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 8, line 9, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "ninety days" and insert "one year"; in line 12, after the words "whenever the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; in line 17, after the words "of the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; in line 20, after the words "of the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; in line 24, after the word "than," to insert "one-half of"; in the same line, after the words "per centum," to insert "per annum"; and on page 9, line 3, after the word "The," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; so as to make the clause read:

(c) To make advances from time to time, upon such terms, not inconsistent herewith, as it may prescribe, for periods not exceeding one year, to any savings bank or other banking institution which receives savings deposits, on the promissory note or notes of the borrowing institution whenever the corporation shall deem such advances to be necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war or important to the public interest: Provided, That such note or notes shall be secured by the pledge of securities of such character as shall be prescribed by the board of directors of the corporation, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, the market value of which, at the time of such advance (as estimated and determined by the board of directors of the corporation), shall be equal in amount to at least 125 per cent of the amount of such advance: Provided further, That the rate of interest charged on any such advance shall not be less than one-half of 1 per cent per annum in excess of the rate of discount for 90-day commercial paper prevailing at the time of such advance at the Federal reserve bank of the district in which the borrowing institution is located. The corporation shall retain power to require additional collateral security at any time.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, after line 4, to strike out:

(d) In exceptional cases, to make advances directly to any person, firm, corporation, or association whose operations shall be necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, for periods not exceeding five years from the respective dates of such advances, upon such terms, and upon the security of such bonds, notes, or other obligations, and subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the board of directors of the corporation, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. The corporation shall retain power to require additional collateral security at any time.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

(d) To make advances directly (1) to any corporation owning or controlling (directly or through stock ownership) any railroad or other public utility, and (2) to any firm, corporation, or association conducting an established and going business whose operations are necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war: Provided, That such advances shall be made only in such cases as the board of directors in their discretion shall determine to be of exceptional importance in the public interest. Such advances may be made for periods not exceeding five years from the passage of this act, upon such terms and upon such security and subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed from time to time by the board of directors of the corporation, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. The corporation shall have and retain power to require additional security from time to time.

Mr. SMOOT. Let this amendment go over.

Mr. CURTIS. Before that order is made I should like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. In line 19 of the amendment I notice the word "person" is left out. I wonder if it was not the intention of the committee to have the word "person" included before the word "firm." As I read the hearings, I understood the Secretary of the Treasury stated that it was intended to apply to persons.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to announce that before the amendment is passed over that I shall offer two amendments to it when it is considered. One will occur on line 20, where I shall move to amend by inserting, after the word "whose," the words "bonded indebtedness is not in excess of actual invested capital," so that it will read:

and (2) to any firm, corporation, or association conducting an established and going business whose bonded indebtedness is not in excess of actual invested capital operations are necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war.

I shall also offer an amendment inserting the word "adequate," on page 10, at the beginning of line 3, so that the amendment will read:

upon such terms and upon such adequate security and subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed from time to time by the board of directors of the corporation with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over.

Mr. HALE. I should like to ask a question of the chairman of the committee. Is there anything in this amendment that would prevent banking institutions from coming under it?

Mr. SIMMONS. To which amendment does the Senator refer?

Mr. HALE. Subsection (d), on page 9.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is confined to corporations owning or controlling, directly or through stock ownership, any railroad or other public utility.

Mr. HALE. I see no reason why in an emergency a bank could not come under this provision as well as any firm, corporation, or association.

Mr. SMOOT. They can apply no matter whether it is an emergency or not under paragraph (b) of section 6. It is not required that there shall be an emergency.

Mr. HALE. But there is a provision for security to be given, and in this section there is no provision for security to be given.

Mr. SMOOT. The banks could not get the money unless they gave security.

Mr. HALE. Corporations and firms can do so. If corporations and firms can do so without security, why can not the banks?

Mr. SMOOT. Not without the security in the case of savings banks, and in the case of national banks the percentage of security they shall advance is specifically named, but in the case of railroads and public-utility corporations the same rule can not be applied because of the fact, as I stated the other day, and I now state it again, in some cases it will be impossible for them to put up the same amount of security as required by the bank.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But the point the Senator from Maine makes is that, according to this provision, the corporation may make advances to certain artificial persons, and they have a discretionary power to pass upon the character of the security they take. If the term "corporation" in the amendment includes a bank corporation, then the bank has a right to tender to the discretion of the board its application for a loan.

Mr. SMOOT. The paragraph specifically says:

(d) To make advances directly (1) to any corporation owning or controlling (directly or through stock ownership) any railroad or other public utility——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is not the point. It turns on the second line on the tenth page:

upon such terms and upon such security and subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed from time to time by the board of directors of the corporation, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. The corporation shall have and retain power to require additional security from time to time.

It is a discretionary matter entirely and, in my judgment, the word "corporation" there does include banks.

Mr. HALE. It seems to me this can be taken care of by putting in the words "other than banking institutions." Then there could be no question about it.

Mr. SMOOT. In that case corporations other than banking institutions would have a right to apply under paragraph 2. Only a railroad or public-utility corporation can secure advances direct from the corporation.

Mr. HALE. I think the Senator is referring to the first paragraph of the section, while I am referring to the second paragraph, which reads, "To any firm, corporation, or association conducting an established and going business," and so forth.

Mr. SMOOT. I see now what the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] means, and he is right in his conclusions. The language "firm, corporation, or association" might include a banking association in some instances as well as any other.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It would include a banking institution, and I am glad it does, because I think that discretionary power should be given. If the Federal reserve bank, for instance, can not cash these obligations for loans, the bank will go directly to the corporation and appeal to them. It is a broad discretion. I think it means just what the Senator from Maine says it means.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be passed over.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 12, after the word "its," to strike out "notes or obligations" and insert "bonds"; in line 14, after the word "such," to strike out "notes or obligations" and insert "bonds"; in line 18, after the words "of the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; and in line 20, after the word "Such," to strike out "notes or obligations" and insert "bonds"; in line 22, after the words "of the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; in line 23, after the words "and the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; in line 24, after the word "Such," to strike out "notes or obligations" and insert "bonds"; on page 11, line 5, after the word "Such," to strike out "notes or obligations" and insert "bonds"; in line 11, after the word "such," to strike out "notes or obligations" and insert "bonds"; in line 18, after the words "by the," to strike out "notes or obligations" and insert "bonds"; in line 19, after the words "of the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; on page 12, line 9, after the words "by the," to strike out "notes or obligations" and insert "bonds"; and in line 10, after the words "of the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation," so as to make the clause read:

or rediscount by any Federal reserve bank of paper secured by such bonds or notes of the United States and in respect to Federal reserve notes issued against the security of such paper shall extend, in so far as applicable, to the purchase or rediscount of paper secured by the bonds of the Corporation and to the Federal reserve notes issued against the security of such paper.

Mr. OWEN. I wish to give notice that to-morrow I will suggest an amendment to this section providing that these bonds shall not be taxable and shall not exceed 4 per cent. I will not stop to consider that matter now, but to-morrow I will present the amendment.

Mr. HOLLIS. I ask the chairman of the committee to allow me to direct his attention to a verbal error. In line 17, on page 10, the word "may" should be changed to "to," so as to read:

And to bear such rate or rates of interest to be redeemable before maturity.

The word "may" has not the same construction, the courts have held.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will go over.

The next amendment was, on page 12, after line 12, to strike out:

(g) To exercise by its board of directors, and its duly authorized officers or agents, all powers specifically granted by the provisions of this act and such incidental powers as shall be necessary or proper to carry out the purposes of this act: Provided, That the powers specifically enumerated herein shall be deemed additional to, and not in limitation of, any implied powers granted by this act: And provided further, That it shall not exercise any of these powers or perform any business except such as is incidental and necessarily preliminary to its organization until it has been authorized by the President of the United States to commence business under the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 1, after "SEC. 7," to strike out:

That for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, and providing for the public security and defense, through the restriction of unnecessary capital expenditures, the corporation may, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the corporation, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, investigate and license, or refuse to license, the sale, or offering for sale or for subscription, of securities, as hereinafter provided.

And insert:

That for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, and providing for the public security and defense, through the restriction of unnecessary capital expenditures, there shall be appointed by the Federal Reserve Board, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, a capital-issues committee, to consist of five members, of whom at least three shall be members of the Federal Reserve Board, which may, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by such committee, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, investigate and license, or refuse to license, the sale, or offering for sale or for subscription, of securities, as hereinafter provided. Such committee shall, however, grant licenses for any such sale, or any such offering for sale or for subscription, which it shall determine to be consistent with the foregoing purposes. The terms during which the several members of such committee shall respectively hold office shall be determined by the Federal Reserve Board, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the compensation of the several members of such committee who are not members of the Federal Reserve Board shall be $7,500 per annum, to be paid by the corporation.

Mr. SMOOT. As there will be one or two amendments offered to this paragraph, which I do not believe will lead to any discussion. I ask that it may go over.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will go over.

Mr. OWEN. I wish to give notice that to-morrow I shall suggest certain amendments to this proposed amendment of the committee so as to provide for a system of appeals from any decision made by the proposed capital issues committee.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 8, after the words "regulations as," to strike out "the corporation" and insert "such committee"; in line 12, after the words "granted by," to strike out "the corporation. The corporation shall, however, grant licenses for any such sale, or any such offer for sale or for subscription, which it shall determine to be consistent with the foregoing purposes," and insert "such committee"; in line 18, after the word "each," to strike out "Any securities which upon the date of the approval of this act are in the possession or control of, or have been hypothecated by, the corporation, association, or obligor issuing the same, shall not be deemed to have been issued prior to the date of the approval of this act, within the meaning thereof," and insert "Issues of shares or securities heretofore made, only a part of which have been sold or disposed of prior to the approval of this act, shall not be affected thereby"; on page 15, line 2, after the word "from," to strike out "the corporation" and insert "such committee"; in line 10, after the words "prescribed by," to strike out "the corporation" and insert "such committee"; in line 15, after the words "omitted by," to strike out "the corporation" and insert "such committee"; and in line 16, after the words "approval of," to strike out "the corporation" and insert "such committee," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. That for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, and providing for the public security and defense, through the restriction of unnecessary capital expenditures, there shall be appointed by the Federal Reserve Board, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, a capital issues committee, to consist of five members, of whom at least three shall be members of the Federal Reserve Board, which may, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by such committee, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, investigate and license, or refuse to license, the sale, or offering for sale or for subscription, of securities, as hereinafter provided. Such committee shall, however, grant licenses for any such sale, or any such offering for sale or for subscription, which it shall determine to be consistent with the foregoing purposes. The terms during which the several members of such committee shall respectively hold office shall be determined by the Federal Reserve Board, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the compensation of the several members of such committee who are not members of the Federal Reserve Board shall be $7,500 per annum, to be paid by the corporation. No person, firm, corporation, or association shall sell, or offer for sale or for subscription, any issue, or any part of any issue, of securities hereafter issued, the par or face value of which issue shall be in excess of $100,000, except in accordance with such rules and regulations as such committee, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe, nor, when required by such rules and regulations, except as permitted by licenses granted by such committee. Shares of stock of any corporation or association without nominal or par value shall for the purposes of this act be deemed to be of the par value of $100 each. Issues of shares or securities heretofore made, only a part of which have been sold or disposed of prior to the approval of this act, shall not be affected thereby. Nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit, or to require any license from such committee in respect of, any borrowing by any person, firm, corporation, or association in the ordinary course of business as distinguished from borrowing for capital purposes. This section shall not be construed to apply to any securities issued by any railroad corporation the property of which may be in the possession and control of the President of the United States. This section shall not take effect until rules and regulations shall have been prescribed by such committee, as hereinbefore provided, and may continue in effect until the expiration of six months after the termination of the war, the date of such termination to be determined by a proclamation of the President of the United States. Nothing done or omitted by such committee hereunder shall be construed as carrying the approval of such committee or of the United States of the legality, validity, worth, or security of any securities.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the whole section go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will go over.

The next amendment was, in section 8, page 15, line 21, after the word "license," to strike out "order" and insert "or of any"; in line 22, after the word "issued," to insert "and duly published"; in line 24, after the word "license," to strike out "order" and insert "or of any"; in line 25, after the word "issued," to insert "and duly published"; on page 16, line 2, after the words "more than," to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$1,000"; and in line 3, after the words "more than," to strike out "four years" and insert "one year," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 8. That whoever shall willfully violate any of the provisions of this act or of any license, or of any rule or regulation issued and duly published hereunder, or whoever shall willfully violate, neglect, or refuse to comply with any such license or of any rule or regulation issued and duly published hereunder, shall, upon conviction in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, be fined not more than $1,000, or, if a natural person, imprisoned for not more than one year, or both; and any officer, director, or agent of any corporation or association, or member of any firm, who shall knowingly participate in any such violation neglect, or refusal shall be punished by a like fine or imprisonment, or both.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the section go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will go over.

The next amendment was, in section 9, page 16, line 8, after the words "of the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; in line 18, after the words "of the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; in line 23, after the words "of the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; and on page 17, line 2, after the words "thereupon the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 9. That all net earnings of the Corporation not required for its operations shall be accumulated as a reserve fund until such time as the Corporation liquidates under the terms of this act. Such reserve fund shall, upon direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, be invested in bonds, notes, or certificates of indebtedness of the United States, or, upon like direction, may be deposited in member banks of the Federal Reserve System, or may upon like direction be deposited in any of the Federal reserve banks. The Federal reserve banks are hereby authorized to act as depositaries for and as fiscal agents of the Corporation in the general performance of the powers conferred by this act. Beginning six months after the termination of the war, the date of such termination to be fixed by a proclamation of the President of the United States, the directors of the Corporation shall proceed to liquidate its assets and to wind up its affairs. Any balance remaining after the payment of all its debts shall be paid to and become the property of the United States, and thereupon the Corporation shall be dissolved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 10, page 17, line 3, after the words "and all," to strike out "notes and obligations" and insert "bonds"; in line 4, after the words "by the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; in line 13, after the word "such," to strike out "notes and obligations" and insert "bonds"; in line 17, after the word "The," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; and, in line 23, after the words "of the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 10. That any and all bonds issued by the Corporation shall be exempt, both as to principal and interest, from all taxation now or hereafter imposed by the United States, any State, or any of the possessions of the United States, or by any local taxing authority, except (a) estate or inheritance taxes, and (b) graduated additional income taxes, commonly known as surtaxes, and excess profits and war-profits taxes, now or hereafter imposed by the United States, upon the income or profits of individuals, partnerships, associations, or corporations. The interest on an amount of such bonds the principal of which does not exceed in the aggregate $5,000 owned by any individual, partnership, association, or corporation shall be exempt from taxes provided for in subdivision (b) of this clause. The Corporation, including its franchise and the capital and reserve or surplus thereof and the income derived therefrom, shall be exempt from all taxation now or hereafter imposed by the United States, any State, or any of the possessions of the United States, or by any local taxing authority, except that any real property of the Corporation shall be subject to State, county, or municipal taxes to the same extent, according to its value, as other real property is taxed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This completes the amendments except those passed over.

Mr. SIMMONS. As all the amendments of the Finance Committee have been agreed to except those that have gone over, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, March 1, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 28, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. John Compton Ball, pastor of the Metropolitan Baptist Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Our Heavenly Father, before the mountains were brought forth or Thou hadst formed the earth or the world, even from everlasting to everlasting Thou art God, and we come to join with all nature this morning in recognizing Thy majesty and Thy wisdom and Thy power. We thank Thee, O God, for the wonderful prominence Thou hast given us among the nations of the earth, for the marvelous way in which Thou hast led us. We thank Thee for the great men of the past who founded the Nation upon the Book of God, and we come to pray that we may be worthy sons of worthy sires. Let Thy blessing, we pray, rest upon this Legislative Hall this day, and may all that is done be done to Thy honor and glory. Lead us in the way of life, and help us to stand for religious liberty, for peace, and for the uplift of humanity. For Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 3915. An act to reimburse Benson County, N. Dak., for money expended in the care of three insane Indians; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

S. 2776. An act providing for the classification of lands under the stock-grazing homestead act in certain States, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR SUNDAY.

The SPEAKER. The Chair designates Mr. TILSON, of Connecticut, to preside next Sunday.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads I move a change of reference of House bill 10239, authorizing the Post Office Department to acquire and extend the telephone system of the District of Columbia; to insure the Government complete control of such means of communication in safeguarding its military and executive affairs within the seat of government; and to promote the service to the public, from the Committee on the District of Columbia to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. MADDEN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. MADDEN. I want to make the point of no quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Do you make it?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point that there is no quorum present, and the Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seventy-five gentlemen are present, not a quorum.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. MOON. I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from Tennessee move a call of the House. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Britten	Fairchild, G. W.	Jones, Tex.	Ragsdale
Campbell, Kans.	Flynn	Kahn	Riordan
Capstick	Focht	Kraus	Robbins
Chandler, N. Y.	Glass	Kreider	Rowland
Copley	Graham, Ill.	LaGuardia	Sanders, N. Y.
Curry, Cal.	Gray, N. J.	Lobeck	Scott, Iowa
Dallinger	Gregg	Longworth	Scully
Dent	Hamilton, N. Y.	McKeown	Sisson
Dill	Heintz	Maher	Smith, T. F.
Drukker	Helvering	Mason	Snell
Dunn	Hollingsworth	Mondell	Stephens, Nebr.
Eagan	Hood	Nelson	Wilson, La.
Eagle	Howard	Nicholls, S. C.
Fairchild, B. L.	Johnson, S. Dak.	Porter

The SPEAKER. On this vote 37 Members, a quorum, answered to their names.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, in order to explain this motion I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] and myself shall each have five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that on this motion to rerefer a bill he shall have five minutes and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I ask that I be permitted to divide my five minutes with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

Mr. MOON. I will amend my motion so as to enable us both to divide our time with the gentleman from Michigan.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee amends his motion so that both he and the gentleman from Kentucky will have the right to subdivide the time. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, this motion raises a question of jurisdiction over the bill H. R. 10239 between the Committee on the District of Columbia and the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. I will read two sections of the bill, so that the House may have the facts before it on which to determine the legal question under the rule. This bill provides in the first section—

That in order to promote the Postal Service the Postmaster General of the United States is hereby vested with a monopoly of the function and means of electrical communication for hire by telephone within the District of Columbia.

And in the second section—

SEC. 2. That the telephone systems and networks within the District of Columbia employed in the transmission of communications for hire and the central-office equipment, underground cables, underground conduits, aerial cables, aerial wires, poles, building cables, subscribers' stations, including indoor wiring and drops to premises of subscribers, private branch-exchange switchboards, land, buildings, furniture and fixtures, tools and teams, stores and supplies, and all other property used in the telephone service and appropriate and necessary for the operation of the same by the United States within the District of Columbia, are hereby declared to be, and the same are hereby, condemned and appropriated to and for the use of the United States of America, to be used by it for such public purposes as may be proper.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is one that provides for additional facilities of the Post Office Department by taking over telephone companies of the District of Columbia. It provides for an appropriation for the payment to the owners of the telephone company, and an issue of bonds is provided and a direct appropriation in dollars and cents for a partial payment.

Then there are other provisions which provide for the control by the Postmaster General of this telephone system in connection with other postal facilities, and a telephone commission is provided to pass upon questions of dispute between the Government and the telephone companies. I may say here that the Postmaster General requests me to say that he is willing and ready to operate the telephones under the direction and by the authority of Congress, and that he has made no other suggestions.

Mr. SHERWOOD. What is the amount of the bonds to be issued?

Mr. MOON. Seven million dollars of bonds is provided in the bill. I state these facts as bearing on the question of jurisdiction. This House has never yet held to what committee questions affecting the telephone system of the United States goes.

Before discussing the rule itself, which in positive terms determines this question, let us look at the reason and the authority by which the Congress of the United States exercises control over the telephone and telegraph. It is under those simple words of the Constitution that Congress shall have power "to establish post offices and post roads." And under the well-known interpretation it has the power to pass all necessary laws to carry into effect the express grants of the Constitution or those fairly implied from it. Under that, it controls the transportation of mails, it controls the roads over which mails may pass, and the whole Postal Service. Therefore, in making the rules of the House for the distribution of the powers of Congress between the committees, the House provided that all subjects relating to the Post Office and post roads, including appropriations therefor, should be submitted to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. That defines the jurisdiction of that committee. It provided further that all subjects relating to the District of Columbia, other than appropriations therefor, should go to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The Committee on the District of Columbia brings into this House a bill that in the very first section of it provides for a postal facility, a means of communication, by which it undertakes to control the Postal Service, to pass a law in reference to it, to give this new and additional facility to the Postal Department of the United States. Whence comes this power? The fact that we propose to take the telephone system in the District of Columbia does not give jurisdiction. The extent of the territory involved does not determine the jurisdiction. The jurisdiction is determined by the subject matter over which you seek to legislate. The subject matter in this instance is postal. The telephone is an adjunct to the Postal Service. Upon that very theory this House once held that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads had exclusive jurisdiction of questions affecting the postal telegraph. And what is the postal telegraph? It is a means of communication to be provided for in the Post Office Service. The telephone is only another means. If we have any power to take over and handle either, it is the result of that clause of the Constitution to which I have referred, and the committee that has jurisdiction to determine it is the committee to which that power has been delegated by this section of the rules.

Now, you will see in a moment that if that were not true, still the Committee on the District of Columbia could not handle this appropriation, because its power goes to those things of a municipal nature alone within the specified territory of the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOON. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks for two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOON. The power of the Committee on the District of Columbia goes to those things that affect the municipality of this territory. This is not a municipal question. This is a postal question, that affects the whole Government, and one section of this bill provides for the handling of this service between the States.

Now, another view: Under the rules of the House this Committee on the District of Columbia is absolutely destitute of any power to make an appropriation for anything. The power to appropriate for a postal facility belongs, by the terms of the rule, to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. I suggest that if this were a bill that provided for a reduction or increase of rates, or for the betterment of the telephone system in the District of Columbia as a public utility, then it would be a municipal question, and that committee might legislate in reference to it; but it makes it a postal facility, and the telephone is a postal facility that would not operate alone in the District of Columbia. If it did, the power would still be in the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. The Committee on the District of Columbia might just as well undertake to assume jurisdiction over a pneumatic tube, or over the screen-wagon service, or over any other postal facility in the District. It is not a question affected by territory. It is the subject matter with which this House must deal—that determining the question of jurisdiction.

The power of Congress to take over the telegraph and telephones arises, as I said, from the provisions of the Constitution that enable it to establish post offices and post roads. These instrumentalities must be taken over as a means of communication—as a part of the Postal System. They can not otherwise be constitutionally obtained. The committee that has the right to legislate and appropriate money for the Postal Service under the rules of the House is the committee that properly has jurisdiction to report a bill on this question. Inasmuch as these instrumentalities can be obtained only as postal facilities, no bill could be drafted under the rules over which any committee except the Post Office and Post Roads Committee would have jurisdiction, unless, possibly, the instrumentalities might be taken over under the war power of Congress by a bill from the Military Committee.

Mr. DUPRÉ. May I ask the gentleman a question?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I desire the Chair to notify me when I have used four minutes of my time.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] has asked for the transfer of this bill from the District Committee to the Post Office Committee, because he says the bill deals with post offices and post roads. I assert that it does nothing of the sort. It deals only with telephones and telegraphs, and it deals only with those institutions in the District of Columbia. The provision of the bill is for the District of Columbia to take over the telephones and the telegraphs only within the District of Columbia.

Mr. MOON. That is for the Postal Service, however.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman from Tennessee believes that because the Postmaster General is named in the bill as the one to manage it, therefore it becomes a postal matter. I say that it does not. Anybody else might have been named just as well. The Attorney General, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of War, or anybody else might have been named instead to take charge of the local telephones after they have been acquired. The man in the moon might have been named to take charge of them after they were acquired by the District of Columbia, but even that would not permit the bill to go to the "Moon committee." The District of Columbia Committee has jurisdiction of legislation pertaining to the District of Columbia, and this bill does not undertake to go beyond the District of Columbia. I say it is a clear proposition that the Committee on the District of Columbia has jurisdiction over this question. I wish to impress that; because the bill says that the telephones shall be controlled by the Postmaster General, that fact does not make it a post-office matter. Any other department of the Government or any individual, whether a Government official or not, might be named in this bill to take charge of these telephones and operate them after the District of Columbia has acquired them.

The gentleman refers to the question of appropriations. If the gentleman makes the point that the District of Columbia Committee has no right to make the appropriation, in return I say that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has no right to make the appropriation for this purpose, because, if the motion should prevail at all, it should be that this bill go to the Committee on Appropriations. The gentleman's committee has a right to make appropriations for post offices and post roads, but not for taking over telephones. Would the Committee on Public Roads, of which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] is chairman, have jurisdiction to take control of a bill to open a road within the District of Columbia, or to improve a road within the District of Columbia? By no means. The Department of Justice would not have jurisdiction over a local court, that the Committee on the District of Columbia for a hundred years has been conceded to have jurisdiction over.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Provided he does not break into my four minutes.

Mr. MOON. The very first sentence of your bill is—

That in order to promote the "Postal Service."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is surplusage.

Mr. MOON. Telephones are in promotion of the Postal Service.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. They may be or may not be. The Postmaster General has been designated in this bill to operate these phones in the District of Columbia after they have been acquired.

Mr. MOON. In connection with the Postal Service.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman from Tennessee himself could be named in that bill instead of the Postmaster

General, and it would not thereby take the matter to his committee any more than it would with the Postmaster General's name.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, without regard to the merits of the legislation proposed in the bill in question, I submit that if the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] prevails and the principle of that motion is adopted as the permanent policy of the House, the District Committee will be practically relegated to that class of committees that has little or nothing to do, about which we heard so much yesterday.

The rules of the House provide that all proposed legislation pertaining to all subjects relating to the District of Columbia, except appropriations, shall be referred to the District Committee. They provide also that all proposed legislation pertaining to all subjects relating to the post office and post roads, including appropriations for their support, shall go to the Post Office Committee.

The bill which the gentleman from Tennessee desires to take away from the Committee on the District of Columbia and have referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, of which he is chairman, provides for taking over the telegraph and telephone lines of the District of Columbia and putting them under the control of the Post Office Department. It is true that the subject matter of the bill deals incidentally with a subject relating to the service of the Post Office Department, but only incidentally, and there is scarcely a subject within the jurisdiction of the District Committee which does not incidentally touch upon the jurisdiction of some other committee as much as this bill does on the jurisdiction of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

I submit that under the rules of the House this bill was properly referred to the District Committee. I read from Hinds' Precedents, section 4277:

The Committee for the District of Columbia reports bills proposing legislation as to the general municipal affairs of the District.

The Committee for the District of Columbia has a general and usually an exclusive jurisdiction of all bills proposing legislation relating to the affairs of the District of Columbia, and reports on such subjects as the extension of streets, affairs of the schools and teachers, control of railroads, police and fire department, etc.

The rules of the House of Representatives provide that all proposed legislation pertaining to all subjects relating to the alcoholic liquor traffic shall be referred to the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic. At the same time the Committee on the District of Columbia has exercised general jurisdiction of bills for the regulation of the sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia. (Hinds' Precedents, sec. 4281.) In the last Congress it reported the bill providing for prohibition in the District. No one has ever questioned the jurisdiction of the District Committee over such legislation. The Agricultural Committee has jurisdiction of and has reported the pure-food legislation. At the same time the subject of the adulteration of food, drugs, and so forth, in the District is within the jurisdiction of the Committee for the District of Columbia. (Hinds' Precedents, sec. 4280.)

Again, the rules of the House provide that all proposed legislation pertaining to all subjects relating to river and harbor legislation shall be referred to the River and Harbor Committee, but the Precedents say that the harbor regulations for the District have been within the jurisdiction of the Committee on the District of Columbia. (Hinds' Precedents, sec. 4286.)

If this is an appropriation bill, then the subcommittee on the District of Columbia of the Appropriations Committee has jurisdiction of it and not the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. The subject of this bill pertains to the telephone and telegraph lines within the District of Columbia and to no other subject.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I can not yield in three minutes. The Post Office Committee has jurisdiction of post offices and post roads, but up to date the subject of this bill does not relate at all to the Post Office Department. The Post Office Department is merely the vehicle for handling postal matters and has nothing to do with the merits of legislation such as is proposed in this bill. I submit, gentlemen of the committee, without regard to the merits of the legislation, that it comes within the jurisdiction of the District Committee under the rules of the House and that the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee should be voted down. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the House bill 10239 be rereferred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads?

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MADDEN and Mr. MOON) there were—ayes 149, noes 102.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I demand tellers.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin demands the yeas and nays. All those in favor of taking the question by yeas and nays will rise. [After counting.] Forty-three, not a sufficient number.

Mr. MAPES. I ask for the other side.

The other side was taken.

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and fourteen gentlemen have arisen. Forty-three is not a sufficient number. The yeas and nays are refused and the motion prevails.

FEDERAL CONTROL OF RAILROAD TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the railroad bill.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 10022, a bill to arrange for the purchase of the Arlington property by the Treasury Department.

Mr. SIMS. I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on going into Committee of the Whole to consider the railroad bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9685) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes. When the committee rose last Tuesday it was about to divide on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET]. Tellers had been ordered, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] will take their place as tellers.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again reported.

Mr. FOSTER. I object.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported that there were 164 ayes and 157 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. COOPER of Ohio moves to amend as follows: On page 12, line 9, strike out the words "But no process" and all of lines 10 and 11 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"No process, mesne or final, shall be levied against any property under Federal control or, in connection with any suit or proceeding that may properly be brought against the carrier under this section, against any property belonging to the owner of a railroad or system of transportation; but the President shall, by regulation, provide for the payment out of the operating revenue derived from Federal control or, if that is insufficient, out of the revolving fund of any judgments or awards, and for the enforcement of any decrees or orders that may be rendered against the United States in any such suit or proceeding."

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I believe this is one of the most important sections of this bill. I am not just so partial to the amendment that I have offered as to insist upon it being adopted. I understand there will be offered other amendments, which will probably change this section as I would like to have it changed, but the first part of the section relates to the liability of common carriers. It says that the common carriers shall be liable as they now are under the State and Federal laws. On page 12, in line 2, I wish to call attention to the words "or with any order of the President." I touched on this in general debate a few days ago. It seems to me that the wording of this section makes it very clear that the carrier shall be liable for an injury or for damages, providing such injury or damages were not caused by an order of the President or by some one else who had governmental authority. Then, in lines 9, 10, and 12, you will find that in case the injured party received a judgment against the carrier there is no way by which he can collect the judgment, for it is provided—

That no process, mesne or final, shall be levied against any property under such Federal control.

It seems to me that when judgment is rendered, that is conclusive evidence that the injured party ought to be paid, but under the wording of the section there is no way whatsoever by which the party receiving judgment can have the same executed. The amendment I have offered provides that whenever a judgment is rendered the President shall be empowered to pay such judgment out of the revolving fund or out of the earnings of the railroad company. I believe that this amendment is fair. I believe in justice to the thousands of railroad employees in this country there ought to be some way of protecting them, as they are now protected under State and Federal laws, and if they recover judgment in the courts I believe that that judgment ought to be paid. If you leave this section the way it is now, there will be no way in which you can have the judgment executed. There will be other amendments offered. I do not know whether this is the best one or not, but I do hope there will be something done along this line before we leave this question.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I sympathize with the gentleman's object, but has he not used the language "judgment against the United States" in his amendment, when, as a matter of fact, he means to say "judgment against the carrier"? Will the Clerk read the amendment again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to amend the amendment by substituting the word "carrier" for the words "United States," to conform with the suggestion of the gentleman from New Jersey.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment by striking out the words "United States" and inserting the word "carrier." Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio if his amendment does not provide to pay a judgment out of the revolving fund or out of the operating revenues received by the Government for causes arising prior to the taking over of the railroads?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I think so.

Mr. SIMS. I think it does, if I heard it read correctly. If the payment of judgments which have been rendered is confined to those rendered against the road while the Government is in control, they would be paid immediately. I understood from the reading of it that a judgment rendered against the railroad company for a cause arising prior to the taking over of the railroads must be paid.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. The bill itself does not prevent and will authorize the President to pay anything for which the Government is liable during Government control.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I would be very much obliged to the chairman if he will tell me where such a provision is in the bill.

Mr. SIMS. The Government takes them over, and it is responsible for everything that happens after it takes them over, and therefore would have to pay the judgment.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question. Does it not say in lines 9, 10, and 11 that no process shall be levied against any property under such Federal control?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Now, where do you provide in the bill that the President shall pay a judgment?

Mr. SIMS. The property of the United States is never levied on in order to collect a debt owing by the United States. This property after it is taken over is in the hands of the Government and must be operated for war purposes. A judgment rendered against the carrier for a cause of action arising after it is in Government control is a judgment in effect against the President of the United States, and you would not want to levy on a train or an engine and stop it from running or carrying troops, because the Government will pay the judgment without anything of that sort. That is a dangerous amendment and does not do any good.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I want to say to the gentleman that my amendment does not provide that you can levy on a train or equipment. It is the very opposite of that.

Mr. SIMS. Let me ask the gentleman. The gentleman strikes out this language:

> But no process, mesne or final, shall be levied against any property under such Federal control.

Does not the gentleman strike that out? Of course he does.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. But I put it in again in the amendment I have offered.

Mr. SIMS. That is exactly what you strike out.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The wording of this section, as the Chair knows, is:

> And in any suit against the carrier no defense shall be made thereto upon the ground that the carrier is an instrumentality or agency of the Federal Government.

Mr. SIMS. Certainly; that is right and it ought to be.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. If defense can not be made, how are you going to levy?

Mr. SIMS. You do not want to levy; the Government will pay, because it is liable.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Where in the bill does it authorize the President to pay the judgment when it has been rendered by the courts?

Mr. SIMS. Because the Government pays a standard return, and certainly when a railroad is being operated through a governmental agency, through the Director General, and a cause of action arises growing out of his action, of course the Government is liable.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I want the gentleman to point to the specific provision where the President is authorized to pay a judgment when it is rendered by the courts.

Mr. SIMS. When a judgment has been rendered against the Director General, or the railroad since the Director General has taken them over, it does not require any further authorization any more than to pay the standard return. We do not provide here that a railroad may bring suit for its standard return.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The gentleman is taking for granted the President or the Director General will pay.

Mr. SIMS. It will be a liability, just the same as wages of employees.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Why did not the gentleman put such a provision in the bill?

Mr. SIMS. If you put everything in the bill, it will be as long as from here to Jericho.

When you specify you have to include everything, and when you begin to specify you must specify everything, or thereby you exclude everything that is not specified. This amendment is wholly unnecessary and can not possibly do any good, because there is no thought of avoiding liability for anything growing out of the operation of railroads during the Federal control.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I will.

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman is laboring under a very wrong impression as to the provision of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio. He does strike out of the bill the words prohibiting the issuance of any process against any property under such Federal control, but he puts them back in his amendment, and it is in there.

Mr. SIMS. There is no use lumbering this up. There is nothing to keep the Government from being liable for what happens in the way of an accident or such matter while the railroads are under Federal control.

Mr. HAMLIN. Why does the gentleman object to the Government paying out of the operating expenses or the revolving fund obligations in the shape of judgments now existing against railroads when they were taken over by the Government——

Mr. SIMS. That is provided——

Mr. HAMLIN (continuing). When the Government takes the roads over under your bill and John Smith has a valid judgment against the Pennsylvania Railroad, for instance, he can not collect it as long as the road remains under Government control.

Mr. SIMS. It will be paid out of what is going to the railroad at the end of Government operation.

Mr. HAMLIN. There is no provision in the bill to that effect.

Mr. SIMS. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, after a careful reading of this bill I am constrained to believe that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER], or one similar in character, ought to be adopted and made a part of this bill. Without such an amendment there seems, to my mind, no question but it would be a futile matter for any litigant to bring suit against a railroad company. This matter is not only important to every employee of the railroad company but it is important to every man, woman, and child in the United States who may receive an injury at the hands of any railroad company taken over by the Government. It is important to the traveling public as well as it is to those in the employment of a railroad company. If the chairman of this committee is right in his contention, there would be no necessity for this amendment, but the bill itself is absolutely silent. What authority have we to say, if it is not written in the bill, that the Government will interpret the bill as does the chairman of this committee? What reason can he urge if he wants that idea in his bill for not having a clause in the bill that will make it plain after it is enacted into law? This is very important. We ought not to leave it to chance, because every Member of the Congress of the United States is directly interested in this piece of legislation. There is not a Member of this House but what every time he takes passage upon a railroad is taking a chance of an injury, and if that injury is caused by the neglect of the company, the company ought to be made to respond in damages, and as this bill is written there is no way that the injured person can collect damages after he has prosecuted his claim to a finality.

Mr. SWITZER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEARNS. I will.

Mr. SWITZER. As I understand the gentleman's proposal is to put in language by which you can enforce the judgment after it is rendered?

Mr KEARNS. That is what we want written in this law.

Mr. SWITZER. There is no use having a judgment if you can not enforce it.

Mr KEARNS. Your judgment, unless it can be cashed, is absolutely worthless, and under this bill I can not help but believe, and I believe it is the consensus of opinion of the lawyers of this House, that the judgment would be a mere scrap of paper, nothing more.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield just for information?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Has the gentleman carefully read the amendment, and can he say whether or not it would authorize or require the payment of judgments for causes arising prior to the taking over of the road?

Mr. KEARNS. I do not think it does, but it ought to do so. If you have a judgment against the railroad company, and that judgment is now pending, and to-morrow the railroad shall be taken over by the Government, the mere fact that that railroad company is taken under Government control to-morrow ought not to defeat your rights under your judgment.

Mr. HARDY. But would the gentleman have that judgment paid out of the $500,000,000 we contribute here?

Mr. KEARNS. I would have it paid out of any receipts that might in the future come into the hands of the Government from the railroad companies.

Mr. HARDY. From the operation of the railroad companies?

Mr. KEARNS. From the operation of the railroad companies.

Mr. HARDY. But not out of this $500,000,000?

Mr. KEARNS. No; not out of this $500,000,000.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman qualifies that. I understand all that you mean is that if there is not enough property of the road and from the operating receipts of the road the gentleman would take from this $500,000,000 to pay it?

Mr. KEARNS. No; I have not said that. I have said that this amendment ought to be so constructed that this judgment should be paid out of any receipts from that road that might be in the hands of the Government or might hereafter come into the hands of the Government.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I recognize very fully the importance of this proposed amendment, and were it worded somewhat differently I would unhesitatingly support it. I grant that this bill does not in express terms provide for the payment of a judgment which may be obtained against the companies even during Federal control. And I also grant, for the purposes of the argument, that it nowhere in explicit terms provides for the payment of judgments, awards, and decrees which have been obtained prior to Federal control. Judgments, awards, or decrees for the payment of money against carriers are charged up primarily against operating expenses and income. All railroad accounting is based upon that theory and upon those facts. This bill does provide that out of the standard return obtained by operating the railroads and the calculation of the standard return all expenses and legal expenditures shall be provided for and taken out of that standard return. But even there the language is not quite explicit enough, because it says:

That for the purposes of providing funds requisite for maturing obligations—

Judgments obtained for personal injuries, we will say, would not be maturing obligations—or for other legal and proper expenditures—

It might be included under that broad term, but it is followed by the words—or for reorganizing railroads in receivership, carriers may, during the period of Federal control, issue such bonds and notes, equipment trust certificates, stock, and other forms of securities.

But I doubt whether the courts would construe that general phraseology, "or other legal and proper expenditures," as inclusive of judgments obtained for such character of cases as that in the mind of the proponent of this amendment.

But the objection—and permit me to address myself to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER]—the objection to this amendment is that you propose to take the payment of these judgments out of the revolving fund, because your amendment says that it shall be the payment out of the operating revenue derived from Federal control, or, if that is insufficient, out of the revolving fund.

Now, this revolving fund——

Mr. CARAWAY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. If the Government takes over the carrier, and so operates it that the return will not pay all the legal liabilities of the company, why should it not pay it out of the revolving fund? Suppose a man is working for the company and he is injured? He is entitled to compensation. He obtains a judgment against it, but the Government so operates the road that there is no revenue out of which it can be paid. Now, then, why should he not be paid out of the revolving fund or any other revenue?

Mr. DEWALT. I do not object to the primary construction given by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], but I am referring to section 6, in which the revolving fund of $500,000,000, as already agreed to and passed by this House, is specifically devoted to certain purposes, and that is that, together with funds available from any funds of the carrier, it may be used by the President for the purpose of paying the expenses of the Federal control, and, so far as necessary, the amount of just compensation, and to provide for terminals, motive power, cars, and other necessary equipment. Now, that exclusively confines that $500,000,000 to the purpose of paying expenses during Federal control. And what is no doubt in the mind of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] and in the mind of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS] is to pay judgments which were obtained even before Federal control. Do I understand it correctly?

Mr. KEARNS. No; that was not my intention.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the gentleman pardon me a minute?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. There is not anything in this bill that, in my opinion, authorizes judgments for injuries occurring before the Government took over the railroads, or, in express terms, for those that may occur during Government control.

Mr. DEWALT. I think I said so.

Mr. CARAWAY. I beg your pardon.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LITTLE. May I ask the gentleman one question?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. LITTLE. Under your system, would the stockholders——

Mr. DEWALT. If the gentleman will permit me just one moment, I wish to say that if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] will reconstruct his amendment in the line of the thought I have tried to present, I will try to give it my support.

Mr. LITTLE. Under your system, would a stockholder of the road receive his compensation before a creditor of the road would receive his pay?

Mr. DEWALT. Oh, no.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. On the contrary, is not that the explicit result of it if you are going to pay him out of the $500,000,000 and not pay the other fellow?

Mr. DEWALT. No. The gentleman is either reasoning in a circle or he did not catch the right point and, therefore, he does not get the right conclusion. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS].

Mr. KEARNS. I think the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is clear, but I was busy reading the bill part of the time. What is the gentleman's opinion on the payment of the judgment?

Mr. DEWALT. There is nothing in the bill that explicitly provides for that, but——

Mr. KEARNS. Would the gentleman be willing to amend the bill so that the prior judgments would be held on the pending judgments?

Mr. DEWALT. When the judgment is final.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SHERLEY. Here was the thought that I was trying to suggest to the gentleman: That any money that should be paid to the railroads for their use and occupancy by the Federal Government, when so paid, would be subject to the payment of any judgment that had been rendered in favor of any person or corporation against such railroad.

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly, sir. The gentleman from Kentucky is exactly right. If he buys a piece of property with a mortgage resting upon it, he buys the property subject to the mortgage, and this would be a lien——

Mr. SHERLEY. A man holding a judgment against the railroad could collect that judgment out of that fund as against any claim of any stockholder.

Mr. DEWALT. There is no question about that.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. You now state that the creditors who were creditors before the road passed into the hands of the Government would be paid out of the $500,000,000 fund.

Mr. DEWALT. No; I did not say that.

Mr. LITTLE. I think you did. You say the minute the money is due from the revolving fund it becomes liable for the railroad's debts. Now, you say the money due the railroads out of the revolving fund could not be liable to the debts of the road after it had passed into the hands of the Government.

Mr. DEWALT. No; the gentleman is mistaken. The gentleman did not start with the right premise. If he had started with the right premise he would have come to the right conclusion. The gentleman said I said this was to be paid out of the revolving fund. I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. LITTLE. This money that the gentleman from Kentucky referred to comes out of the revolving fund.

Mr. DEWALT. No; he was not referring to that at all.

Mr. LITTLE. It comes out of the $500,000,000.

Mr. DEWALT. No. If the gentleman had listened to him and to me he would have understood.

Mr. LITTLE. It is the gentleman who is reasoning in a circle, not I. You say the compensation will be due from the Government to the railroads. From that you agree to pay, according to your theory, a deficit that accrued before the matter passed into the hands of the Government. Is that correct?

Mr. DEWALT. We do not agree to do it, but in all honesty we provide that the President shall make regulations by which those just debts should be paid, not by execution but by regulations of the President.

Mr. LITTLE. Why not pay it out of the $500,000,000?

Mr. DEWALT. There is no objection to that except that the $500,000,000 fund is devoted to specific purposes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I think this matter has been confused by speaking of judgments recovered before the Government takes over the railroads. It should be judgments obtained after the Government had taken control of the roads.

Mr. DEWALT. Yes. That is stated by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. No. All operating expenses due on bills not rendered are expected to be paid out of the operating expenses in the ordinary course of accounts. Is not that a fact?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes. I have stated that in my remarks heretofore.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Ought not that to be stated in the bill definitely?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes; I agree with the gentleman on that. I have stated to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] that if he will re-form his amendment along the line indicated I will give it my support.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will you not aid in that way?

Mr. DEWALT. I will if I can.

Mr. CARAWAY. Answering the question before, the gentleman said that moneys paid out for injuries, in satisfaction for injuries, were part of the operating expenses?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. Does not your bill provide that the carrier shall receive certain fixed compensation, which, of course, will pass to its stockholders? Now, if that comes by agreement with the carrier and is not a fund out of which this money can be paid and the judgment paid, will not the party with the judgment against the railroad lose it? I do not know that I am making myself clear.

Mr. DEWALT. The bill provides that the company shall be paid according to the standard return. Do not forget that portion.

Mr. CARAWAY. I will remember that.

Mr. DEWALT. Now, the standard return is made up in a certain way. How is the standard return made up? It is made up by taking the "annual railway operating income, including therein such income of lines acquired by, leased to, or consolidated with it," and in addition to that the United States may, by deductions from the standard return, or by other proper means and charges, be reimbursed for the cost of any addition, repairs, renewals, and betterments, and so forth. There are to be certain deductions made, and "in the computation of such income, debits, and credits arising from the accounts called in the monthly reports to the Interstate Commerce Commission equipment rents and joint facility rents shall be included. The standard return and the cost of such additions, betterments, or road extensions are to be ascertained by the Interstate Commerce Commission from the reports, books, and other pertinent data of such carrier and certified by it to the President. Its certificate shall, for the purpose of such agreement, be taken as conclusive of the amount of such average annual railway operating income and of such cost." Now, all that process is gone into, and these operating expenses are deducted from the income, and the net result makes the standard return.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] offers a substitute. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I have decided not to offer my amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers a substitute for the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 11, at the end of the line, insert the following:
"The President shall by regulation provide for the payment out of the operating revenue derived from Federal control, or, if that is insufficient, out of the revolving fund, of any judgments or awards, and for the enforcement of any decrees or orders, that may be rendered against such owners in any suit of such a character that but for Federal control (a) it could be brought against the owner of any railroad or system of transportation; and (b) any amount paid in compromise thereof or in satisfaction of a judgment or decree therein could be charged to operating expenses or to railway tax accruals under the Interstate Commerce Commission of classification of accounts in force on December 27, 1917. The President shall also provide for the payment, out of operating revenues or out of the revolving fund, of any loss accruing to any owner by reason of any process levied against any property of such owner in connection with any suit of the character above described."

Mr. SIMS. Is this to be a substitute for the entire amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER]?

Mr. LENROOT. It is now; yes.

Mr. SIMS. One other question: Does it provide for the payment of judgments for causes of action against the railroad arising prior to Federal control?

Mr. LENROOT. It does not.

Mr. SIMS. Then I am certainly in favor of the substitute.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield for that purpose?

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to take a few minutes in the discussion of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky will have his opportunity later.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman from Kentucky has an amendment to which I think there will be no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I want to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. That is all right. The gentleman will have his opportunity later.

I do want to discuss the clear necessity, as it seems to me, of adopting some amendment, either of the character of the one proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] or the one that I have now proposed as a substitute, for this reason: That the bill as it now stands prohibits, or attempts to prohibit, any carrier from making any defense that would otherwise be permitted, on the ground that the carrier is an instrumentality or agency of the Federal Government. It seems very clear that we have no right, that we can not constitutionally prevent the carrier from making the defense that negligence charged was not that of the carrier as an agent but was due wholly to an order of the President of the United States acting through the Director General of Railroads.

Mr. SIMS. I meant to be understood as accepting the substitute on behalf of the committee.

Mr. LENROOT. I did not know whether the gentleman would accept the amendment as amended by the substitute.

Mr. SIMS. I supposed that was all I had to do.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. Let me ask this concrete question: Does your substitute for the Cooper amendment intend to pay judgments or executions thereon out of any portion of the revolving fund?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. DEWALT. Then I should have to oppose it. If you confine it to operating expenses, that is all right.

Mr. LENROOT. If the operating expenses are not sufficient to pay the judgments; but I want to state—I do not think the gentleman will disagree with me—that my amendment provides that no judgment shall be paid out of either operating expenses or the revolving fund unless it is a judgment arising out of a cause of action accruing during Federal control and is of such a character that under the Interstate Commerce Commission classifications of accounts it would be chargeable to operating expenses.

Mr. DEWALT. That is all right then, but——

Mr. LENROOT. So it would come out of the revolving fund only in the event that there were not sufficient revenues to pay the judgment.

Mr. DEWALT. I wish the gentleman could see his way clear to express the intent that it shall not be paid out of the revolving fund at all, because the revolving fund is explicitly devoted to other purposes.

Mr. LENROOT. I will very frankly state why I do not do that. If we are to prohibit the carrier from making any defense that it is not an agency of the Federal Government, we must give to that carrier a complete remedy so as to make the carrier only a nominal defendant in fact. The carrier must be assured that while the judgment is rendered against it in form, full provision is made for the payment of it. When it is of such a character that it must be charged to operating revenue——

Mr. REED. Will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. REED. I understood the chairman of the committee to say that as to those judgments or liabilities arising prior to Government control the parties entitled to recover would have no remedy until after Government control ceased.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true only so far as enforcement of the lien upon the property taken over by the Government is concerned. They could at once levy upon this compensation that we are paying the railroads. They could levy upon any property that was not taken over by the Government belonging to the railroad. They could levy upon any money in the treasury of the railroad corporation.

Mr. REED. I did not so understand the chairman of the committee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. The statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin is correct.

Mr. WINGO. Do I understand the gentleman's statement to be that a man who recovered judgment against the railroad could levy upon this fund in the hands of the United States Government?

Mr. LENROOT. No. I expressly stated the contrary.

Mr. WINGO. I knew the gentleman did not intend to, but I think he did make that statement.

Mr. LENROOT. If I did, I want it corrected. I was saying that they would have the right to levy upon the money that we pay over to the carrier the moment that money gets into the possession of the carrier.

Mr. WINGO. Into the carrier's hands.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. But, of course, they could not levy upon anything in the hands of the Government.

Mr. LENROOT. No; certainly not.

Mr. WINGO. That was the reason I asked the question. I did not think the gentleman intended that.

Mr. LENROOT. I thank the gentleman for correcting me if I made that statement.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I should like to ask my colleague [Mr. LENROOT] in what way his amendment differs from the one that I offered? I am asking for information.

Mr. LENROOT. There are two differences. In the first place, the amendment that the gentleman offers will cover not only judgments arising out of causes of action accruing before we took over the control of the railroads, but it also covers every judgment rendered against the carrier, whether that judgment would be chargeable to operating expenses or not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. In my time, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] whether his amendment would not take care of causes of action arising before the Federal control commenced?

Mr. LENROOT. If the amendment is adopted?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Just as it is.

Mr. LENROOT. Just as it is, it will not, out of the money in the hands of the Government, or in the hands of the carrier as an agency of the Government.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Does not the gentleman think, then, that that language in his amendment had better come out?

Mr. LENROOT. No; I think all judgments will be collected without the slightest question out of the money in the treasury of the corporation from the property of the corporation. I do not think there will be the slightest difficulty about that.

Mr. LITTLE rose.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition as a member of the committee.

Mr. LITTLE. If the gentleman from South Dakota will excuse me, I will be through in a minute.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I think this is one of the most important amendments proposed to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not debatable, the question is on the request of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can not the gentleman from Tennessee give us a little more time so that the gentleman from Ohio can have some time?

Mr. SIMS. I will make it 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that all debate on the amendment and amendments thereto close in 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. I object, unless we have more time, so as to get information on this important question.

Mr. SIMS. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the amendment and amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that all debate on the amendment and amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WINGO) there were—30 ayes and 7 noes.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Arkansas wants time for himself, I will be glad to ask for more time and give him such time as he wishes. The gentleman did not state that he wanted it.

Mr. WINGO. I am not so constituted that I care to jockey over an important matter in the division of time where the gentleman in control shows no disposition to heed any protest and makes no answer to courteous protests against shutting off proper discussion.

Mr. SIMS. I tried to find out how many wanted time and tried to make provision for them.

The CHAIRMAN. All this discussion is out of order unless the gentleman from Arkansas desires to withdraw his point of order.

Mr. WINGO. I do not, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Ninety-three Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. SIMS. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed as tellers the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS].

The committee divided; and the tellers reported that there were no ayes and 123 noes.

So the committee refused to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum is present. The vote on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee was 30 in favor and 7 in the negative. The motion prevails, and the gentleman from South Dakota is recognized.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, what was the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee that has been adopted?

The CHAIRMAN. That all debate on the amendment and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman from Tennessee simply moved to close debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moved to close debate on the amendment and all amendments thereto.

Mr. WINGO. And the Chair rules that debate is closed on the particular amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. On the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] and all amendments thereto.

Mr. WINGO. And unless a gentleman can get time he can not offer an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. He can offer an amendment.

Mr. WINGO. I would be glad to, but that would be a vain offer on a question of this importance, if sufficient time is not allowed to explain it and discuss it on its merits.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LITTLE. I asked the Chair for the floor, and the Chair recognized me for five minutes, and then the gentleman from South Dakota said he was a member of the committee and asked to be recognized.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I waive my right in favor of the gentleman from Kansas.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I think there has been a confusion of terms here that has misled some of us. It has bothered me, but I suppose older Members can get around it. I find on looking at the bill that section 6 says:

That the sum of $500,000,000 is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, which together with any fund available from any operating income of said carriers may be used by the President as a revolving fund for the purpose of paying the expenses of Federal control, and so far as necessary the amount of just compensation, and to provide terminals—

And so on. The $500,000,000 appropriated and operating income constitute the revolving fund. The gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Wisconsin have been misled in their use of the term "revolving fund." They overlook the fact that it contains the $500,000,000 appropriated by this bill. I have in my hand the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin, which says:

The President shall by regulation provide for the payment, out of the operating revenue derived from Federal control, or if that is insufficient, out of the revolving fund, of any judgments or awards and for the enforcement of any decrees or orders.

The operating income is included in the revolving fund, as appears from section 6, and as I stated a few moments ago, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] were both confused on that, and I think it has misled us all a little. We now find this to be the fact: That whatever judgments they want paid out of this they desire paid out of the revolving fund, which means in the final analysis it shall come out of the $500,000,000, just as I stated to the gentleman from Pennsylvania when he accused me of reasoning in a circle, and he was not reasoning at all, because he had not the basis of facts to reason from. A man brings suit against a railroad, and under this amendment he will be allowed to be paid from the one or the other. This is a confusion of statements. This should be corrected, so as to say whatever he means it shall say. It is an impropriety to say "out of the operating revenue or the revolving fund," because the operating revenue is a part of the revolving fund.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. I agree with the construction the gentleman has placed now upon it, but the question in my mind is, Should this law provide for the payment out of the $500,000,000 contributed by the Government of debts arising from causes prior to the taking over of the railroads?

Mr. LITTLE. I was just coming to that. I see penciled in the amendment, to do justice to the gentleman from Wisconsin, what was not there at first, that he is allowing these remedies for causes which accrue during Federal control only, which would refuse a man who had won his suit before the railroads were taken over an opportunity to get his money. That would be a moral injustice and a legal wrong. If you are going to arrange that the man who sues the railroad after it passes into the hands of the Government shall be paid out of the revolving fund, certainly you ought to arrange to pay the man who now has a claim against the Government, a prior lien.

Mr. HARDY. I want to ask the gentleman this question: Suppose there are a lot of bankrupt roads taken over; would the gentleman validate all of the judgments now existing against those roads?

Mr. LITTLE. I would not do that.

Mr. HARDY. And pay them out of the $500,000,000?

Mr. LITTLE. Now, that would not follow at all. The debts of a bankrupt road would be in the same position that they are in now. The fact that they are in bankruptcy fixes their status. If a road is bankrupt, it is bankrupt, and the debts against it follow it into the courts of bankruptcy. They would not be claims here under this bill; they would abide by the courts' decisions.

Mr. HARDY. But if the gentleman provides by the bill that these debts shall be paid out of the $500,000,000——

Mr. LITTLE. Oh, I have not yet drawn my amendment; when I do, that will be arranged for.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, if the gentleman took over a factory and operated it, would he be willing to pay all of the judgments that might have been rendered against it arising out of causes of action before he took the factory over?

Mr. LITTLE. No; I would not; and why should I? But a railroad is not like a factory. Can the gentleman not get the distinction between a quasi-public corporation and a private factory owned by an individual? The State has a much greater authority over the one than over the other.

Mr. STEVENSON. Judgments against railroads in practically all of the States are made first liens ahead of bonds or any of these liabilities; that is, judgments for personal injuries.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman from South Carolina always knows the law; and let me answer the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] further before it slips away from me. These judgments are liens now on the railroad, and if somebody had a lien on a factory which I bought, I would have to pay it, and these men who put these railroads in Government hands will escape with their property from those liens if the gentleman's amendment carries, and I think if the other one does, too. Any lien holder might foreclose and take from him any factory he took over, and there is no reason why the Government should help any railroad to avoid that rule of law.

Mr. HAMLIN. Is there not this solution in it for these holders of prior judgments—that the Government guarantees under this bill the return to these carriers at some period these roads in as good condition as they were when we received them?

Mr. LITTLE. I expect that that means physical condition.

Mr. HAMLIN. Can the judgments not be collected then?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; but why should a man who now has a judgment be delayed while future judgments and compensations to stockholders are paid?

This somewhat revolutionary legislation, involving this Government in such tremendous expenditures, giving the railroad companies such sweeping guaranties endowing somebody to be designated by the President with such unlimited authority, is asked of this Congress under the statement, as we understand, from the administration that this law is essential to the successful prosecution of the great war. I could wish that the petition were more specific, definite, and certain; that the evidence were more competent, more relevant, more material; that the argument were more germane, more profound, more convincing. This Congress is voting simply on an assertion, but the appeal is to one's patriotism, and the resistless sweep of mighty events leaves short time for examination and reflection on a measure that will continue to affect the destiny of the Republic when the bugle blows taps at the funeral ceremonies of the last soldier that returns from Europe.

You have guaranteed to return these highways, which the public made possible by its own investment of the right of eminent domain, in as good condition as they are now. Every lawyer in the House knows that a railroad company may dispute the justice of the Government's definition of that condition and that the claims of the railroads may never be finally adjusted till about the time the last pension is paid for the last time.

Gentlemen, the author of this measure should have provided an accurate system for settling those claims and for protecting the Government against those gigantic demands that will probably run into billions. This $500,000,000 will come from taxes and money loaned by the people to the Government at 4 per cent. There should be some reasonable explanation here why a man with a boy on the firing line should loan money to his Government at 4 per cent and sell wheat at 20 per cent less than the price fixed by the law of supply and demand to pay a higher rate to the railroad investor, who, at the worst, is only making the same sacrifice practically that is required of all our citizens. Equity and justice demands that the railroad stockholders should receive a just, equitable, and sufficient compensation for the use of their property, and for this I shall stand. But these are the only people in effect whose rights are guaranteed by law, and the committee should have so presented the necessities of the administration and the justice of this statute that the taxpayer as he works may read and comprehend. In the paragraph under discussion no provision was made that guaranteed a creditor of the railroad company that he should receive his due. Do you think an ordinary man would see the justice of that? Even now we are told that a man who has lost his horse or his limb and has a judgment lien against the railroad should not be paid till the war is over, while he must loan money and pay taxes to compensate the stockholder in the railway for the use of his property. Surely, gentlemen, this could have been so drawn and so presented as to treat all citizens fairly.

I want to say that the compensation you pay these stockholders of these railroads is going to come, just as I indicated to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in the final analysis, from the $500,000,000 the Government advances. Of course, it will be paid out of the operating income if they can, but that is a part of the revolving fund, too. If that part does not pay it—and you know it will not in some cases—you will compensate these people who own these railroads out of the $500,000,000 that you put into it, and you refuse to compensate the creditors who now have debts, liens against those railroads. You will pay the men who own the railroads interest upon their money and refuse to pay their debtors who now have judgments against them, which is a gross injustice.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], in the fifth line, so that it will read, "Upon causes of action arising during or prior to Federal control."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the Lenroot amendment by inserting in the fifth line, after the word "during," the words "or prior to the," so that it will read: "and for the enforcement of any decrees or orders upon causes of action arising during or prior to the Federal control," etc.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I think the matter is so plain that I do not care to argue it.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to this section of the bill.

Mr. SIMS. Has the time been exhausted for debate?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not. There are nine minutes remaining.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be read and the gentleman be allowed to discuss it in the time——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio may be read for information at this time. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, has not the gentleman a right to have his amendment offered and read without unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. Not at this time. It is an amendment to the section and not an amendment to the amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman offers an amendment, which will be read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "control," in line 11, page 12 of the bill, insert "any final judgment heretofore rendered or that hereafter may be rendered against any common carrier under Federal control shall be paid out of the operating revenues derived from the common carrier against which a judgment has been or hereafter may be obtained."

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, the only reason I have offered this amendment is that it might take care of millions, perhaps, in judgments that may be pending against common carriers that will be taken over by the Government. The very fact that these roads, some of them prosperous, should be taken over by the Government is not a sufficient reason why the holder of a judgment, the injured party, should not recover his money. Under the bill as it stands such a person as this would be entirely defeated in his rights to recover on his judgment, because he is without process of law to enable him to levy upon any property of that company. Then, for another reason, that any judgment that may in the future be obtained against any railroad company taken over by the Government the Government, out of the receipts of that company as far as the receipts are ample, shall pay that judgment.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEARNS. I will.

Mr. LENROOT. Suppose the receipts are not sufficient for that purpose and the negligence is that of the Government and not of the carrier?

Mr. KEARNS. The Government has taken over the railroads, and unless there is some modification of this bill wherein the Government is to be made responsible, providing it shows in the trial of the case or the courts may decide the Government is responsible by its order or the negligence arising from the Government's order, I can see no reason why the Government ought not to pay that.

Mr. LENROOT. That is what I propose.

Mr. KEARNS. That might come in another place in the bill, but the gentleman's amendment does not cover the ground that is sought to be covered by this amendment. My amendment has not sought to remedy that defect in the bill, although I think the gentleman's amendment or some other amendment ought to be offered in the proper place that the defect may be cured, but the thing I am trying to reach by this amendment, which I do not believe other amendments look after, is the fact that if I have a judgment against a railroad company, a final judgment, that judgment ought to be paid out of the receipts of that company, as far as the receipts are sufficient, and the very fact that the railroads should be taken over by the Government, and all of these railroads are coming to Washington clamoring with the Director of Railroads that they should be taken over, ought not to defeat me from realizing on my legitimate final judgment.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEARNS. I will.

Mr. HARDY. Would not the gentleman's amendment arrive at the same purpose if he made its terms apply to judgments existing before the taking over and then take the Lenroot amendment——

Mr. KEARNS. That part of it will be all right. I think the Lenroot amendment cures one defect in the bill, another defect from the one I seek to cure, and that is that the Government itself shall pay the judgments that have been obtained in the courts by reason of the fault of the Government itself. The railroad company ought not to be made to pay in that event. But my amendment provides for an injury that has been caused either by the fault of the owners of the railroads or by the fault of the Government, and the Lenroot amendment, a part of it, ought to be enacted into law and it ought to be made a part of this bill, but my amendment undertakes to cure a defect that no other amendment that has been offered to this bill has undertaken to cure.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does not the gentleman get out of one dilemna into another? The gentleman makes a judgment against the road payable out of the revenues earned by the road subsequently, irrespective of whether the earnings are sufficient to take care of it and other obligations or not.

Mr. KEARNS. I think the railroads ought to pay their judgments first.

Mr. SHERLEY. But which judgment?

Mr. KEARNS. Judgments obtained in the courts against the company.

Mr. SHERLEY. But sometimes they ought to pay an old judgment, and sometimes they ought not, depending upon the revenues they have got. There are priorities of judgment, of which the gentleman loses sight.

Mr. KEARNS. But priorities of judgment should be followed by the Government in paying those judgments, too.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to the amendment? That is not in order at this time. There is pending an amendment.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment and accept the one the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. There remains four minutes of debate——

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, then I offer my amendment as an original amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas objected to the withdrawal of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] one question, whether his amendment would require the President to pay a judgment against an insolvent company.

Mr. LENROOT. It certainly would, providing the judgment arose out of a cause of action arising during Federal control and upon such a cause of action that in private control the judgment would be paid out of the operating revenues, but no other.

Mr. DILLON. Assuming that there should be a foreclosure against an insolvent company and a judgment was rendered against that company, then the President would be required to pay, notwithstanding the fact that the company was insolvent?

Mr. LENROOT. Not at all. That would not be a charge against the operating revenue. Any judgment there would be a charge having nothing to do with the operation of the railroad, and the President would not be permitted to pay a judgment of that kind.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman from South Dakota will permit in his time——

Mr. DILLON. Certainly.

Mr. WINGO. Under the gentleman's amendment would a judgment rendered against an insolvent railroad have to be paid out of the revolving fund?

Mr. LENROOT. It would not be paid out of any fund unless it was a judgment arising during Federal control and of such a character that it would be chargeable to operating revenue.

Mr. WINGO. Now, under the gentleman's amendment, a judgment procured 24 hours before the President took charge of the road could not be paid at all?

Mr. LENROOT. Not out of this fund.

Mr. WINGO. Would it be paid at all, under the language of the bill?

Mr. LENROOT. Not so far as the Government is concerned.

Mr. WINGO. But the railroad?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. WINGO. I have not been able to get enough information to know whether the gentleman's amendment will take out of the bill the provision which prevents a levy to collect a judgment.

Mr. LENROOT. There is nothing in the bill except the levy on the property that we have taken over. They may not levy against any money in the Treasury.

Mr. WINGO. In the case of two roads I have in mind a farmer would be compelled in one instance to go to New York and in the other instance to Louisville in order to levy upon funds in the hands of the railroad treasurer to satisfy a judgment for killing of stock unless the bill is amended. In small judgments the expense that could not be properly charged up as court costs would be larger than the amount of the claim. The gentleman's amendment would not take care of that?

Mr. LENROOT. It would not, and neither does the original bill.

Mr. WINGO. You do not cure it. Under the original bill these creditors who have received a judgment for a little claim that is recognized and properly adjudicated, and which under the law as it stood at the time the judgment was rendered was a first lien in the State upon the roadbed and upon the rolling stock, under this proposed law and under the gentleman's amendment they would have to wait until the Government surrendered control before they could get satisfaction of their judgment?

Mr. LENROOT. If they could not get it out of the property taken over.

Mr. WINGO. All the property they have the Government has taken charge of, except the money?

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no. Many railroads own property that we have not taken over at all.

Mr. WINGO. All railroad property they have a right to own under some of their charters has been taken over?

Mr. LENROOT. That is true as to railway property, but they have money invested in office buildings, and things of that kind, and in securities and bank accounts.

Mr. WINGO. But those bank accounts are in the centers of the country and their location unknown to the judgment creditor.

Mr. LENROOT. I will say that my amendment neither affects that one way or another.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DILLON] has expired.

The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky to the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. As I understand the parliamentary status, some gentleman—I believe the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER]—offered an amendment, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] offered a substitute for that. Was that it?

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

Mr. WINGO. Now the debate has been exhausted on the Cooper amendment but not on the Lenroot amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It has been exhausted on the Cooper amendment and all amendments thereto.

Mr. WINGO. The right of amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The right of amendment has not been exhausted.

Mr. WINGO. I should like to offer an amendment to the Lenroot amendment, then.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. WINGO. It is not in order now?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order at this time.

The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the Lenroot amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN: Line 3 of the Lenroot amendment, after the word "control," strike out the words "or if that is insufficient, out of the revolving fund"; and in line 12 strike out the words "or out of the revolving fund."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the Lenroot amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment of Mr. WINGO to the Lenroot amendment: After the words "may be," in the fifth line of the Lenroot amendment, insert the words "or have been heretofore."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arkansas have five minutes in which to discuss his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arkansas may have five minutes.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, the committee and the gentlemen who have heretofore used all the time have shut off debate, so that it is impossible to get full information, and now no one can hope to discuss this in five minutes with any degree of satisfaction. Therefore, I decline, with thanks, such limited offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not debatable. Does the gentleman from Iowa press his request?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No. The request is withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa withdraws his request.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, can the amendment be read again?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the Lenroot amendment as it would read if modified by the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. ALEXANDER. What I asked for was the Lenroot amendment as amended by the amendment agreed to and offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman to make the request that the Lenroot amendment be read as it would be with the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas adopted. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin, with the amendment as adopted, proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], be read. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Page 12, line 11, at the end of the line, insert the following:

"The President shall, by regulation, provide for the payment out of the operating revenue derived from Federal control of any judgments or awards, and for the enforcement of any decrees or orders upon causes of action arising during the Federal control that may be rendered against such carriers in any suit of such a character that but for Federal control, (a) it could be brought against the carrier, and (b) any amount paid in compromise thereof or in satisfaction of a judgment or decree therein that could be charged to operating expenses or to the railway tax accruals under the Interstate Commerce Commission's classification of accounts in force on December 27, 1917. The President shall also provide for the payment, out of operating revenues, of any loss accruing to any carrier by reason of any process levied against any property of such carrier in connection with any suit of the character above described."

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, before the vote is had, can we not have the amendment read again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas will again be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the Lenroot amendment after the words "may be," in line 5, by inserting the following: "or have been heretofore," so that, as amended, it will read, "and for the enforcement of any decrees or orders upon causes of action arising during Federal control that may be or have been hereafter rendered against such carriers in any suit of such a character."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman, a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 37, noes 41.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seventeen gentlemen are present—a quorum.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. WINGO. Before the words in the Lenroot amendment "Federal control" I offer to insert the words "or judgment rendered before."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WINGO to the Lenroot amendment: In the fifth line of the amendment, before the words "Federal control," insert the words "or judgments rendered before."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that. We have just voted on that question.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, no, Mr. Chairman; it is a different proposition entirely. I would have offered it even if my other amendment had been adopted.

Mr. MADDEN. Then I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WINGO. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 28, noes 40.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment after the Lenroot amendment is disposed of.

Mr. STEVENSON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from South Carolina an amendment to the Lenroot amendment?

Mr. STEVENSON. I have an amendment to the amendment that I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send it to the desk. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STEVENSON amends the Lenroot substitute as follows: Add at the end of the substitute the following: "and when a final judgment is obtained on a cause of action arising prior to the beginning of Federal control he shall provide for its payment, and the sum so charged shall be deducted from the standard return going to the road against which the judgment shall have been obtained, but the payments so made shall not exceed the standard return."

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. All debate is exhausted. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I submit a unanimous-consent request that the gentleman from South Carolina be given 10 minutes in which to disguss his amendment. He is qualified to discuss his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Carolina be permitted to proceed for 10 minutes in the discussion of his amendment, the former order of the House to the contrary notwithstanding. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the Stevenson amendment to the Lenroot amendment.

The Stevenson amendment to the Lenroot amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be modified by striking out the words "standard return" and inserting the words "the sum accruing."

Mr. STEVENSON. That is perfectly satisfactory. If there is an agreement, it will be the sum accruing. If there is no agreement, it will be the standard return.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the Stevenson amendment to the amendment, just adopted, may be modified by striking out the words "standard return" and in lieu thereof inserting the words "the sum accruing." Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, following this as closely as I am, and being deeply interested in the proposition, I do not understand what the gentleman means by that. I think instead of running along here not knowing what we are voting on, we ought to know what we are doing by unanimous consent. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's purpose, but as I understand the proposition offered, it would nullify it.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the committee, all debate has been closed.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes.

Mr. WINGO. I ask for 10 minutes for the gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. I have objected to ten minutes, but I am willing that the gentleman shall have five.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] have five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. I have no objection. I am glad to get any information I can get.

There was no objection.

Mr LENROOT. I think the words to be inserted should be "the sum accruing as compensation."

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, the whole reason for the change suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is this: We want to provide for paying these liabilities arising prior to Federal control, but we do not want to provide that the Government has got to pay more than the railroad companies have in their hands.

Mr. WINGO. Before the Government took control a judgment in a State court was a prior lien, if it was rendered in a certain class of cases.

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Now, on a judgment rendered on the day before the Government took control, under the bill as it now stands, the plaintiff could get absolutely no satisfaction in most instances, because the only property out of which he could get satisfaction, and upon which the local sheriff could levy, would be the roadbed and the rolling stock. Will the gentleman's amendment meet that situation and permit the roadbed and the rolling stock either to be levied on, or if that is impracticable, that the judgment shall be a charge against the income that the Government is supposed to pay the carrier and be deducted by the Government?

Mr. STEVENSON. My proposition is that in so far as there is income in the hands of the Government going to that road, the Government shall apply it; and the only suggestion is that that be called the compensation accruing for the use of the road, so that the Government will not have to pay out more money for the road on an obligation that the road owed before the Government took it over than it will get for the road. In other words, the gentleman from Arkansas says, suppose a judgment was obtained the day before Federal control. Then it was a fixed liability, and this section which prevents any process from issuing against that property is as to that absolutely null and void anyway, because, in my judgment, it has taken away the process which the man who holds the judgment is entitled to. I see gentlemen shaking their heads, but I have looked at some of the decisions on this question, and I know it has been so decided. But whether it has or not, you do not want to vote here to require the Government to pay liabilities existing when it takes over the roads in excess of the money which it has for those roads, and thereby assume all of those liabilities. Now, I assume that there will be some method of proceeding in equity to require the assets of the road to be applied whenever the proceeds of operation in the hands of the Government are exhausted.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman think it is any more the duty of the Government to pay the bondholders, who, under the law in most States, would have a junior lien to a judgment creditor in a certain class of cases, than to pay that class of creditors? Would the gentleman have the Government pay the bondholder who under the law has a junior lien and not take care of the judgment creditors?

Mr. STEVENSON. No; the Government has got to pay the liens in the order of their priority, in the order of their rank; and a man who has an arm cut off, or a man who is crippled for life, or who loses his eyes, and gets a judgment has a first lien, which stands ahead of the claims of the bondholders and of everybody else; and I take it that in making the rules for the enforcement of the law, the Government would certainly have discrimination enough to pay the claims in accordance with the priority of the liens. I am certainly in sympathy with the gentleman's idea about that. In my district day before yesterday, under notorious negligence—admitted by the railroad company—in one accident they killed 12 people and injured 38 very seriously. Those people ought to be provided for, and we ought not to shut the door in their faces; but, on the other hand, we ought not to make this Government assume all that liability and provide for it beyond the funds which it will have in its hands; and I take it for granted that when these cases are reduced to judgment they will have a lien ahead of everybody else. That is the law, and the Government will see that they are paid first, and that these people shall not be deprived of their rights.

Mr. WINGO. I should like to get the gentleman's judgment on this feature: Suppose the standard return is not sufficient to meet the liens of the bondholders; will the Government have to take care of their claims under the law?

Mr. STEVENSON. I have not considered that. That is not an obligation which is reduced to judgment as yet, and it will be an obligation which they will have to consider when it comes to deal with the standard return. I am not familiar with that feature of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the amendment to the amendment which has been adopted may be modified in the way which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "standard return" where they occur in both places in the amendment and insert in lieu thereof the words "sum accruing as compensation."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the substitute the following:
"When final judgment is obtained on a cause of action arising prior to the beginning of Federal control he shall provide for its payment, and the sum so charged shall be deducted from the sum accruing as compensation going to the road against which the judgment shall have been obtained, but the payment so made shall not exceed the sum accruing as compensation."

Mr. LENROOT (during the reading). Strike out the word "going."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin that the amendment be modified so as to read as it has just been read from the Clerk's desk. The Chair hears no objection. The question now is on the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin as amended.

The question was taken, and the substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is upon the Cooper amendment as amended by the substitute.

The question was taken, and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a new paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:. .

Amend by inserting, before line 12, page 12, the following:
"The operating accounts and business of the carriers shall be continued as in a going concern, so that overlapping and deferred accounts and claims which in railroad accounts have been and are usually paid as current operating expenses shall be paid out of operating income; and on the surrender of the carrier it shall be returned subject to any such overlapping accounts and deferred claims so overlapping or deferred in the ordinary course of railroad business."

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, the adoption of the amendment which has just been read makes it necessary that some such provision as what I propose should go in the bill. It was claimed before that it was not necessary, and that was the only reason the clause is not in already. It is now necessary. As we know, every railroad receives its accounts for the past month for what it is to pay and it has its own claims for every past month rendered to different people and may not get them in for several months. Sometimes a claim against a railroad arising out of ordinary operation is deferred because it is litigated, and remains deferred, although it is a small accident, for four or five years. But whenever it comes in to be paid, the course of railroad accounts has always been that it is paid as an operating expense; and the Government, therefore, during the past month in the control of railroads I have no doubt has been paying accounts by reason of accidents and claims which may be several years old. If they have been properly deferred in the ordinary course of railroad business, they ought to be paid out of the operating receipts. When the Government comes to surrender the roads there will be a lot of operating claims against the railroad which the carrier will take with the railroad and the railroad will become subject to.

I did not vote for the last amendment because that provided that all judgments, or some judgments, should be paid, as it were, out of capital. That is to say, the judgments recovered before the railroad came into the hands of the Government should be paid as if they were a claim against capital, although that judgment may have been a claim arising out of operation and ought to be paid in the ordinary course of railroad business as operating expenses. So also when the United States surrender the railroads they do not have to surrender them clean and clear, but as a going concern. The Government does not take the property from the railroads; it takes the carrier and controls his business, and that is all there is to it; that is implied throughout the bill; but it is necessary now, as the House has tried to legislate—and not entirely right as it seems to me, but that makes no difference—it is necessary now to say plainly that you mean the railroad carriers to be taken and run as a going concern. If you mean that, you ought to say so. I therefore offer this amendment as expressing the idea under which the control of these carriers is taken, that they are taken control of as a going concern.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PARKER of New Jersey) there were 31 ayes and 24 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky: Amend, page 12, line 9, by adding the following after the words "Federal Government":
"Nor shall any such carrier be entitled to have transferred to a Federal court any action heretofore or hereafter instituted by or against it, which action was not so transferable prior to the Federal control of such carrier; and any action which has heretofore been transferred because of such Federal control or of any act of Congress or official order or proclamation relating thereto shall, upon motion of either party, be retransferred to the court in which it was originally instituted."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I believe that a mere statement of facts will show the necessity of this amendment. On December 20 last a most horrible railroad wreck occurred near the little town in which I reside. In that wreck 49 people were killed and a greater number were injured very seriously. Remember, please, that this wreck occurred on the 20th of December, and on the 28th of December, eight days later, Federal control of the railroads came. On the second day after this wreck occurred the president of the road came out in the newspapers in a signed statement admitting the liability of the road and expressing the hope that all of the cases arising out of the wreck might be settled without litigation. However, all of them have not been so settled. Suit has been brought in several cases, and the railroad has gone into court and asked for a transfer of those cases from the State court to the Federal court upon the theory that the Federal Government has control. I do not believe that such is the law of the case, neither do I believe that Members of this House will take that view of it. However, the opposite view has been taken by the State courts and, if I am correctly advised, also by the Federal court. I have a letter in my hand from Nat W. Halstead, who is a very able attorney of our State, in which he says:

It is well known that Judge Kerr, of the Fayette Circuit Court, and Judge Adams, of the Breathitt Circuit Court, have sustained pleas in abatement because of this question of jurisdiction, and I also understant—but of this I am not certain—that the plea has also been sustained by the judge of the Henderson Circuit Court. I think they are greatly in error, but, nevertheless, this has been done.

In a brief which was filed before the Federal court at Louisville, Mr. Charles Carroll, an able attorney, said:

The sole basis of the contention of the plaintiff (the railroad) in this court is that by this proclamation the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. passed under the control of the President, and as this control was authorized by an act of Congress it passed under his control by virtue of the Constitution and laws of the United States, and, therefore, any question arising which would affect the revenues of this road or would result in judgment for or against it arises under the Constitution and the laws of the United States, and the Federal courts have jurisdiction if the amount in controversy is sufficient.

I addressed a communication to the Director General of Railroads concerning this question, and in answer he says:

The fact is that he (the plaintiff) is just as free to sue the company now as at any time. The President's proclamation recognizes the right affirmatively, and the House bill, which is now pending before the Congress, not only expressly authorizes the suit but provides in section 11, page 12, line 7, "no defense shall be made thereto upon the ground that the carrier is an instrumentality or agency of the Federal Government."

The attorney for the Director General, Mr. Payne, takes the same view of it. In a communication to me, he says:

I beg to advise you that the Director General has made no order authorizing the transfer of any action instituted in the State courts to the Federal courts. The policy here is for the rights of litigants to remain as before the President's proclamation. No right to a removal is to be based upon the change.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. DILLON. Are these cases to which the gentleman refers against a foreign corporation?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; all those who were either killed or injured were intrastate passengers, and the suits are against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, which is a corporation created by the laws of the State of Kentucky. I am clearly of opinion that except that the courts have been holding otherwise, this legislation would not be necessary by anyone; but we have all heard the old story of the lawyer who was asked to go to see a client who was in jail. After the lawyer had heard the fellow's story he said to him, "Why, they can not put you in jail for that." Then the fellow who was in jail replied, "But the trouble is, I am already in jail." That is the condition now before the House.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman evidently is of opinion that lines 5 and 6 on page 12 do not cover the emergency that he has in mind. Lines 5 and 6 read:

Suits may be brought by and against such carriers and judgments rendered as now provided by law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes. The amendment that I have offered provides that no transfer shall be made from a State court to the Federal court, except under the law as it existed prior to the accident. Some cases have been so transferred. This amendment would restore them to the court which unquestionably has jurisdiction of the cause of action when it accrued.

Mr. DEWALT. Is it the gentleman's desire to clarify that phrase in those two lines, and particularly the language "as now provided by law"?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; that is my purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires the attention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS]. While the discussion of the Cooper and Lenroot amendments was in progress the gentleman from Ohio sent to the desk and had read for information an amendment which he gave notice he intended to offer. Does the gentleman desire to offer it at this time?

Mr. KEARNS. I am under the impression the Lenroot amendment embodies the amendment I had in mind, and I desire, therefore, to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I did not offer the amendment, because I was advised by gentlemen upon the floor in response to inquiry that the Kearns amendment had been adopted. If I had not understood that it had been adopted I should have offered it, and I trust my colleague will either offer it or I shall offer the same amendment.

Mr. KEARNS. I prefer that the gentleman should offer it and let us vote for it. As an accommodation to the gentleman from Arkansas, I will not withdraw my amendment, and he can discuss it if he so desires.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment really has not been offered.

Mr. WINGO. I shall offer it. I think the committee thought it had been adopted, but it was not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 11, after the word "control," insert: "any final judgment heretofore rendered or that hereafter may be rendered against any common carrier under Federal control shall be paid out of the operating revenue derived from the common carrier against which judgment has been or hereafter may be obtained."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is it not a fact that the amendment which was agreed upon as finally modified, offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin, covers that point?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hardly thinks that is a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WINGO. I will say to the gentleman it does not.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact there is some controversy whether this question is covered by the Lenroot amendment and the amendment to the Lenroot amendment, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arkansas be given five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. This amendment is open to debate.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I will proceed if the gentleman from Ohio does not care to do so. Mr. Chairman, so that the committee may understand what it has done I shall read the Lenroot amendment from the copy which the gentleman has. That will be sufficient for my purposes even if I do not get it exactly as adopted. The language I read will cover the question that is involved in my amendment. It is as follows:

The President shall, by regulation, provide for the payment out of the operating revenue derived from Federal control, or, if that is insufficient, out of the revolving fund—

I believe that was cut out—of any judgments or awards and for the enforcement of any decrees or orders upon causes of action arising during Federal control that may be rendered against such owners in any suit of such a character that but for Federal control it could be brought against the carrier and any amount paid in compromise thereof or in satisfaction of a judgment or decree therein could be charged to operating expenses or to railway tax accruals under the Interstate Commerce Commission classification of accounts in force on December 27, 1917. The President shall also provide for the payment, out of operating revenues or out of the revolving fund, of any loss accruing to any carrier by reason of any process levied against any property of such carrier in connection with any suit of the character above described.

Now, the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, and that was adopted, added at the end of the Lenroot amendment this language:

And when the final judgment is obtained on a cause of action arising prior to beginning of Federal control he shall provide for its payment, and the sum so charged shall be deducted from the sum accruing as compensation to the road against which that judgment shall have been obtained, but the payment so made shall not exceed the sum accruing as compensation.

Now, if the committee will follow just for a moment. The Lenroot amendment, of course, does not take care of the proposition covered by the Stevenson amendment and that amendment takes care of judgments hereafter rendered upon causes of action that may have accrued before Federal control. Now, my amendment provides payment of all judgments upon all causes of action. Why have a distinction between one whose cause of action accrued before Federal control, but did not get judgment until after such control, and the man whose cause of action not only accrued before, but also obtained judgment before Federal control? Now, what justification is there to deny relief in one instance and not in the other? The Stevenson amendment takes care of one class of cases but not the other. Under my amendment both classes of judgments would be paid out of funds held by the Government belonging to the railroad against which judgment has been obtained.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Could you not reach the same end in a simpler and more direct way by inserting the proper language in the Lenroot amendment?

Mr. WINGO. Certainly; but the House voted down such an amendment. The Government can lose nothing by my amendment. The Government can simply take the funds of the railroad in its hands and apply them to the satisfaction of the judgments which were rendered before Federal control as well as those rendered after, as provided by the Stevenson amendment. Vote down my amendment and the farmer who obtained a judgment for the wrongful killing of his stock or the employee who has a judgment for personal injuries will not get what is due him by the verdict of a jury and the judgment of a court, but adopt my amendment and each will be paid what is justly due him, and such payment deducted from the funds of the railroads.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee desire recognition?

Mr. SIMS. I ask unanimous consent that the debate on this amendment close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. And all amendments thereto?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; and all amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that all debate on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago, when I withdrew this amendment, I was laboring under the impression that the Lenroot amendment as amended on the floor of this House covered the point involved in this amendment. Since that time I have learned that I was in error, and for that reason I am now insisting that this amendment ought to be adopted and made a part of this law.

You can go into any State in the Union and you can find men and women holding final judgments to-day against railroad companies, aggregating hundreds of thousands of dollars. If this amendment is not adopted these men and women, who have been diligent in obtaining their rights from the railroad companies, will be defeated. There will be no way left by which they can realize upon those judgments. I do not know how many such men and women in the United States hold judgments, but certainly thousands and tens of thousands of them. Some of them, through the negligence of railroad companies, have lost legs and arms and have been otherwise mangled in body for life, and because they happen to bring suit in the courts and reduce their claims to final judgments before the taking over by the Government of these railroads they will never be able to realize on their claims. There is not a State in the United States but has statutes of limitations that run against judgments.

I do not know how long the Government is going to keep control of these railroads. We all know, however, that it is going to keep that control as long as this war lasts. And, I take it, there is no man in this House who can this afternoon even make a guess as to how long this war is going to last. And if this law is made a permanent law, they never would be able to reduce their judgments to cash.

Men on the floor of this House have said that these judgments will bear interest, and will continue to bear interest as long as the judgment is alive. That is poor consolation for the poor man or the poor woman who has been crippled for life. That is poor consolation indeed for the widowed mother and the orphaned children who have lost, by the negligence of some railroad company, a father and a husband.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Suppose a person has a judgment before the Director General takes charge of the railroad, he has got a claim against the railroad company, and is there anything to prevent him from renewing his judgment or suing it after the Director General takes hold of the railroad?

Mr. KEARNS. There is no provision in this law to take care of that condition, and it is the only question that is involved in this amendment. That is all I seek to do. We are only trying to take care of that class of people, so far as the funds in the hands of the Government that have come out of the railroad company's earnings are concerned.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Your amendment would cover that situation?

Mr. KEARNS. My amendment would cover that situation, and nothing else. And I can not understand why men would oppose this amendment when these people are entitled to recover as far as the earning capacity of that road is able to pay. I can not understand how any man would object to this, except the owner of a railroad system.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. If I understand the gentleman, the Lenroot amendment takes care of claims where judgment may be hereafter rendered?

Mr. KEARNS. May be hereafter rendered.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. But where judgments have already been rendered, it has been the contention of the gentleman there can be no satisfaction of the law without this amendment?

Mr. KEARNS. There never can be such a satisfaction as that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. LENROOT) permit me to submit a unanimous consent request, that my amendment be amended by striking out the words "operating expenses" and substituting "the sum accruing as compensation"? It is the language of the Stevenson amendment, to which I want to make this same language conform.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment in a way which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modify the Wingo amendment by striking out the words "operating revenue" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "sum accruing as compensation."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on the amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not think the gentleman has this yet. I will read it as it is.

Mr. WINGO. My purpose, I will say to the gentleman, was to make it comply to the same rule, that it might come from the same fund that the funds come from that satisfy the judgment covered by the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, aside from any merit there is, it seems very clear to me that this matter should be left to the conference committee upon the amendment that has already been adopted, and if it does not cover judgments heretofore obtained, the conferees can include it; but certainly the House does not wish to adopt the amendment in this form, for it would read as follows, and, of course, the intention of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], and I think we all understand what he means, is not expressed. It would read, if adopted, as follows:

Any final judgment heretofore rendered or that hereafter may be rendered against any common carrier under Federal control, shall be paid out of any of the sums accruing to compensation to be derived by the common carrier against which the judgment has been or hereafter may be obtained.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to make it read "by" instead of "from."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to modify the language of his amendment as indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. LENROOT. Of course there is no compensation derived by a common carrier until it gets the money.

Mr. DEMPSEY. It should be "to be derived."

Mr. LENROOT. Now you are getting it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Why not change the word "derived" to the word "received"?

Mr. LENROOT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have only one word to say. I think it would be very proper to have this cover previous judgments, provided they were of the same character, as we provide for the payment of judgments while under Federal control, but I doubt very much the wisdom. Here may be judgments very much in excess of the entire sum accruing to a carrier, especially the short-line roads. How is it to be apportioned? Is the President to apportion it between them? He can not pay more than so much. Is he to pro rate it?

It seems to me it raises a multitude of questions that make it very difficult of administration. Of course with the limitation that is now in it the Government can not be injured, because in no event can the President pay more than the railroad is entitled to receive as compensation from the Government.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Does not the gentleman think it will be best to allow certification of these judgments while in Federal control and then leave it discretionary with the Director General or the President as to their payment, so that he can classify them under the well-known rules of receiverships?

Mr. LENROOT. I think what should be done—and I suggest it to the conferees—is that when they get into conference the way to settle that will be to have a certification of these judgments and let the judgments be a lien on the compensation which the railroad is entitled to receive.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. HELM. If I am not mistaken, in Kentucky the workmen's compensation law does not apply to employees of railroads. As I catch the drift of this amendment, there are regulations only where the compensation law is applicable. I think, under the law of the State of Kentucky, recoveries for personal injuries are not controlled by any standard compensation return. Would this amendment restrict a State where compensation is determined by a jury trying a special case?

Mr. LENROOT. No; I think not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer the amendment in a clarified form, as the change that was made necessitated another change.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman's amendment prepared?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment which he offered and offer in lieu thereof an amendment which he sends to the Clerk's desk. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WINGO: After the word "control," on page 12, line 11, insert "any final judgment heretofore rendered or that hereafter may be rendered against any common carrier under Federal control shall be paid out of the sum accruing as compensation to the carrier against which such judgment is or was made."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the withdrawal of the former amendment and offer of a new amendment?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment just read.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. BARKLEY. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 43, noes 27.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, does that dispose of the entire amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. That is an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, yes; that is an amendment to the amendment. Mr. Chairman, it is just 24 hours at this moment since we commenced on this section yesterday. There has been exceedingly liberal time granted, and I want to ask unanimous consent——

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. There is nothing pending to justify the gentleman's waste of time.

Mr. SIMS. I want to make a unanimous-consent request, that all debate on all amendments and amendments thereto offered on this section close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto shall close in 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object. I have an amendment as to the question of taxes at the end of the section, which is an entirely different matter from anything else, and I shall object unless I have the right to bring that matter up.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and any amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. As I understand the gentleman's proposition, he proposes to close debate on something that is to come up hereafter and which is not now being considered and to which amendments have not yet even been offered.

Mr. SIMS. The section is before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The section is before the House.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, may I make a parliamentary inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. I should like to propound this inquiry: If we adopt the motion it will mean, will it not, that we will not be permitted to discuss, except those of them who are fortunate enough to get this 20 minutes, any amendment that may be offered, however important it may be?

The CHAIRMAN. That will be the result. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] moves that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto shall close in 30 minutes. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend that by making it 45 minutes.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, no!

Mr. STAFFORD. I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin withdraws his amendment. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. SIMS. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The Committee divided; and there were—ayes 55, noes 34.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey, a member of the committee, offers an amendment, which the clerk will report.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, may I make a suggestion? As I understand it, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] has an amendment. May some agreement be made as to the division of time between these three amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman any request to make?

Mr. TOWNER. I ask unanimous consent that 10 minutes' time be devoted to each one of these three amendments.

Mr. ROMJUE. I should like to make a suggestion to the gentleman.

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. ROMJUE. I should like to have five minutes. That will make the division four instead of three. I should like to be included in the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] asks unanimous consent that the 30 minutes of debate may be divided between three amendments.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I have two amendments.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. Will the Chair state what those three amendments are?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no information upon that subject. Will the gentleman from Iowa state his request?

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time be divided into three parts, to be devoted to three amendments, the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER], an amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], and one which I myself will offer.

The CHAIRMAN. And that these three gentlemen control the time?

Mr. TOWNER. I do not care anything about the control of the time. I suppose there will be five minutes in favor of each amendment, and five minutes in opposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the 30 minutes of debate may be divided into three parts, 10 minutes each, to be devoted to the amendments offered by the gentleman from New Jersey, an amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], and an amendment that is to be offered by himself. Is there objection?

Mr. RAYBURN and Mr. BORLAND objected.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I will ask that both my amendments may be read now, so that they may be understood.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey, and without objection will report the other amendment for the information of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PARKER of New Jersey: Page 13, line 10, after the words "laws or powers of the States in relation to taxation," insert:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to admit the right of the several States directly or indirectly to tax war business conducted by the United States, or increased values of property, or franchises, or increased operating revenue resulting from such war business."

Amendment offered by Mr. PARKER of New Jersey: Page 13, line 10, after the proviso following the word "taxation," insert:

"Provided, That in order to prevent increase or diminution of taxes payable to the several States or under the several State laws by reason of the said war business and Federal control, and in order to avoid dispute and litigation, the President in any case may pay, respectively, to such States or their municipalities or other bodies acting under State laws, during the period of Federal control, taxes standardized at the sums which were assessed and payable by said carriers, respectively, in the calendar year 1917, to be payable in each year at the same time and in the same amount as they were in 1917, as well as the amount of any taxes which were assessed in the year 1917 upon real estate that shall have been acquired by such carrier while under Federal control, or by the United States for the purposes of this act."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the last amendment that was read.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. That is not offered yet.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not offered yet.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will reserve a point of order on the first amendment. It is practically the same as a previous amendment that was rejected.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. There is no difficulty about that, Mr. Chairman. The objection to the former amendment was that it was not germane to provisions as to how taxes be paid. But it is now provided that nothing in this act shall be construed to amend, repeal, impair, or affect the existing laws and powers of the States in relation to taxation. It is really necessary, however, that a guard be put in. Mr. Anderson, who prepared this bill and who brought it before us, was asked about this. He said that if the States should undertake to levy new taxes in kind or degree that would not have been levied if the money were not coming from the Federal Treasury the Government is not helpless; that it could protect itself by litigating the matter. He said that if it appeared that the States had levied taxes which were such in kind or degree that they are really taxes upon a Federal agency and not within the express or implied power of this bill, the courts would hold them unconstitutional.

Mr. Chairman, the States levy their taxes on different principles. Some levy on value. I do not believe a patriotic State would raise that value because of increased business. Some levy it on the gross receipts, and they are important States. They include Illinois, New Hampshire, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Virginia. There are some six or eight more. They levy on gross receipts. During the war those gross receipts will increase by reason of Government business, war business, the carrying of guns and munitions, and the troops of the United States. We have provided that the railroads shall not get the benefit of the new business as a return, and we ought to see that the States shall not tax that new business, because it is United States business and not the business of the railroads.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I want to say that the gentleman is entirely mistaken about the New York law.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. If the gentleman will look at page 77 of the hearings, he will see it stated there.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The law of New York is not as the gentleman understands it.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. At any rate those who do not levy on receipts might increase their valuation. I brought before this committee some time ago a statement of certain railroads showing that they went up 50 per cent before 1863.

In 1862 there was a tax put on gross receipts, and I have the figures of all the railroads since that time. The 3 per cent tax in 1863 netted over $1,106,000—$1,106,817.02. That means that they had $37,000,000 of gross receipts. In 1864 the tax it brought in nearly doubled that sum—$2,127,249.69—showing nearly $71,000,000 of gross receipts. In 1865 on a 2½ per cent tax it brought in nearly $6,000,000—$5,917,293.51—or over $236,000,000 gross receipts. In 1866 tax receipts of $7,614,448.13 show over $304,000,000 in gross receipts, an advance of nearly tenfold in three years.

My first amendment provides that nothing herein shall be construed to admit the right of a State to tax Government business, and in the second amendment I say that in order to avoid litigation which was spoken of by the gentleman who came before our committee, the United States could arrange without dispute to pay the same amount of money they paid for taxes in 1917, which was a prosperous year for the railroads. It does not say that that shall be binding on the States, but they can assent.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. How would it be possible to determine the amount of increase of business due to the war of the railroad systems?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. That is something that Mr. Anderson, who came before our committee, said was easy to determine. I think it is difficult, and that is why I proposed a second amendment, that the United States without dispute will pay the same amount of taxes that they did before the war.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I will.

Mr. FESS. In the exercise of priority orders they make a sharp distinction between essential and nonessential products. Suppose the most of the work is for the essentials for war, what about those receipts?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Ought it to be taxed by the State? Is it fair? That is the question I am putting before you. Is it fair that essential war business should be taxed? In order to avoid dispute, I do not say that the States must accept, but the Government without dispute will pay what they did in 1917, just as the carriers pay on the average net return in 1915, 1916, and 1917. I would like to hear from the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT].

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey has another amendment, which has already been read, and the question is on that amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 10, after the word "taxation," strike out the period and insert a comma and add the following language: "or the lawful commerce and police regulations of the several States, except wherein those regulations may affect the transportation of troops, war materials, or Government supplies, the regulation of rates, the expenditures of revenues, the addition to or the improvement of properties or the issue of stocks and bonds."

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, if any other gentleman wants to be heard on this amendment, I am willing to limit my time to less than five minutes and divide with him. The amendment proposes to come in at the end of line 10, which says that nothing in this act shall be construed to amend, repeal, impair, or affect the existing laws or powers of the States in relation to taxation.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the gentleman from Arkansas will accept the amendment to strike out the words "commerce and," the committee will not oppose it.

Mr. CARAWAY. I will be willing to accept it without discussion. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to strike out the words "commerce and."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment as the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modify the amendment by striking out, after the word "lawful," the words "commerce and."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification?

There was no objection.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment read as it will read as modified?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 10, after the word "taxation," strike out the period and insert a comma, and add the following language: "or the lawful police regulations of the several States, except wherein these regulations may affect the transportation of troops, war materials, or Government supplies, the regulation of rates, the expenditures of revenues, the addition to or the improvement of properties or the issue of stocks and bonds."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 2, after the word "control," strike out the words "or with any order of the President."

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, the language in section 11, to which my amendment applies, is as follows:

That carriers while under Federal control shall, in so far as is not inconsistent therewith, or with the provisions of this act or any other act applicable to such Federal control, or with any order of the President, be subject to all laws and liabilities as common carriers, whether arising under State or Federal laws or at common law.

The amendment which I propose is to strike out the words "or with any order of the President."

Stated a little more plainly, the language of the bill would read:

The railroads while under Federal control shall be subject to all laws and liabilities as common carriers arising under State or Federal laws or at common law now existing, except in so far as such laws are repealed by this law or by laws hereafter to be passed or by order of the President.

To retain the language "or by order of the President" is to place in the hands of the President the power to repeal by a simple order any or all State or Federal laws, or even the common law, controlling railroads and fixing their liabilities for negligence or torts. It even gives him power by an order to repeal all existing laws defining crimes and affixing penalties and punishments. Never before has it been even proposed to grant in this or any other civilized country such power to any man.

Everyone knows that from the earliest periods of English history the common law made carriers responsible for negligence and torts. Not a State of the Union but has added laws passed to regulate carriers and to definitely fix their liability. From the time the Congress began to legislate in control of interstate commerce a large body of national statutory regulations has been enacted. If these are not retained the labor of years for the betterment and safety of service and the protection of the people will be lost.

It is generally understood that in order to repeal an existing law a repealing law must be passed. So carefully is the efficacy of laws guarded that the courts will not allow a law to be repealed by indirection. Either the subsequent enactment in direct terms must state that the existing law is repealed or the subsequent statute must clearly appear inconsistent and in contradiction to the existing law. But here the power is given to repeal any or all existing laws by any law which Congress may hereafter pass—a provision entirely unnecessary because such power exists in any event—and the President is given power by "any order" to repeal any or all existing laws. This is to grant to the Executive the legislative power to repeal laws.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. On page 11, at the beginning of the section, it is provided that carriers while under Federal control shall, in so far as is not inconsistent with Federal control, be liable.

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Could not the President under that clause make any order he might see fit to make that would take the roads out from under liability if inconsistent with Federal control as operated by him?

Mr. TOWNER. I think not; for if that was the intent no provision would be made that the carriers were still to be subject during Federal control to all the laws and liabilities now existing.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman does not want any carrier to have a right that is inconsistent with Federal control?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly not; but this provision is intended to preserve the rights of the people and to prevent the carriers from ridding themselves of their obligations and liabilities. This intent is clearly expressed, and then follows the proposition that the President may take from the people their rights and relieve the railroads of their liabilities by a simple order.

Mr. BARKLEY. Only so far as his action shall be consistent with Federal control.

Mr. TOWNER. Only so far as the President thinks shall be consistent with Federal control. Suppose some adviser tells the President that he could manage the roads a good deal better if the safety appliances laws were abrogated, or that all State laws were but an interference and should be repealed; or that the hours-of-labor laws would interfere—if this provision remains, the President by an order could repeal any or all of these laws. Suppose it should be suggested that it would help the Government in its operation of the roads if no suits for damages for negligence, or for loss of life or property, should be brought. No action would thereafter lie if the President so ordered.

All the existing laws which are thought to be an interference with Federal control are by this bill repealed. If any law is hereafter found to interfere in the slightest degree with Federal control for war purposes, it can be considered by Congress and repealed. We are all ready and willing to grant to the President any power needed to carry on this war to a speedy and successful conclusion. But these are matters apart from the control of the railroads for war purposes. These are guaranties and safeguards secured by the people through long years of struggle, and no one would be heard to contend that they are not as necessary in time of war as in peace. The railroads will be directly managed by the same men, operating the roads in the same way, in so far as the ordinary business of the country is concerned, as before the war. The protection of the lives of the people and reasonable care in the preservation of their property will be just as important in the future as in the past. Gentlemen would not claim that these guaranties and safeguards should be taken away. They seek to retain them by the very clause we are considering. Thus acknowledging their importance and value, the phrase I seek to strike out would, if retained, give the President the power by a mere order to obliterate any or all of them. That certainly is unwise, and I hope my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer as a substitute for the amendment, after the word "President," in line 2, page 12, to insert the words "authorized by such acts or any thereof."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. DEMPSEY: Page 12, line 2, after the word "President," insert the words "authorized by such acts or any thereof."

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I think if the gentlemen who are in charge of this bill will observe the language of this amendment as proposed by me they will see that it is in accord with the act. If there is any question, and I doubt whether there is any question, for I do not believe, with the gentleman from Iowa, that this clause is susceptible of the interpretation he places upon it, I do not believe that the President would be authorized to make any order except an order which would be authorized by the acts which are referred to, but if there is any doubt I think we could well afford to insert the language I suggest.

Mr. BARKLEY. Could he make any order that was not consistent with Federal control and that would be determined by the act of 1906 and this act?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I do not think that he could, and I do not think that my amendment is necessary, but it can do no possible harm, and it answers the objection of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. As far as the committee is concerned, we are willing to accept the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DEMPSEY. So that the membership will understand I will just explain for one moment. The proposition of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] is that by the language of the bill the President would be authorized to issue orders inconsistent with this act or the act of 1916 by which he would take away all liability of railroads. Now, I do not believe that is so at all, but it is very easily possible in the language proposed by me to obviate any such danger. All you need to say is that you simply authorize the President to make such orders as are authorized by these acts. He can not then make an order by which he avoids liability, he can not then make any order except such orders as are permitted by these acts, and it seems to me that the whole thing disappears, if there is anything to disappear. As I said, I do not think it is necessary in the matter anyway, but by the use of this language it clarifies it beyond the possibility of any dream or imagination.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. In respect to the act as it now stands what is there in this section that limits or prescribes the kind of order that the President can make?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I think that the language of the section, taken as a whole, limits and prescribes the kind of an order that the President can make.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Does not the gentleman think it is at least doubtful?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Well, I should hardly say it is doubtful; if it is doubtful, the language proposed by me clarifies it.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That raises another question. I am dealing with the section as it stands. It strikes me, if the gentleman will pardon me, that there is no question of doubt but that the section as it stands gives the President most sweeping authority to make any sort of order, and it says in substance that these carriers shall be subject to all the laws and liabilities as common carriers unless the President shall order otherwise.

Mr. DEMPSEY. No; I think what it says is this, that the carriers while under Federal control shall, so far as not inconsistent therewith, or with these two acts, or with any order of the President. Now, I think the order of the President refers back to the preceding part of the sentence and is qualified by the reference to those two acts. But suppose it is not? Then insert this language, which does clarify, and do away with that doubt.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Would not the motion of the gentleman from Iowa to strike out the language to which this motion relates bring about in the most direct way that same result?

Mr. DEMPSEY. No; I do not think it would, because the President might want to make some orders.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. This does not interfere with the making of orders.

Mr. DEMPSEY. He may want to make some orders under those acts which it would be necessary for him to make. He can not make any orders that are inconsistent with them, but at the same time put in the language suggested by my amendment to clarify this section—to make it plain that the right to make orders is limited to such orders as are authorized by the acts.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Just strike out that language and there is not any doubt remaining as to what the President can do.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Then you take away the authority to make any order.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the substitute. Mr. Chairman, it seems very clear that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] ought to be adopted; and it is equally clear that the substitute proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] does not reach the question at all, because the gentleman knows that the President now claims that none of these acts are in force, that there is no right of action to-day except as he by order permits it; and if he has now the right to permit these actions, the gentleman would continue to give him that right by his language when the very purpose of this section is to save to the injured party the right, in so far as not inconsistent with this act and the Federal-control act, to sue and the right to have a remedy. Now, the gentleman urges that this language carries back the words "or with any order of the President" as something not being inconsistent with the act. That is not true, because any order that the President makes you expressly provide shall overrule this right that is given. Unless this amendment is adopted as offered by the gentleman from Iowa, unless the words "or with any order of the President," are stricken out, the President will have the power to say there shall be no action against any railroad company. He will have the power to say that there shall be no compensation for any injured railway employee except such compensation as he thinks they ought to have. He will have the power, unless this amendment is adopted, to substitute for the present employers liability act the present United States employees' compensation act.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I will.

Mr. FESS. I think the gentleman is entirely correct in the plain reading of the language that carriers while under Federal control shall, in so far as not inconsistent therewith—that means Federal control——

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. FESS (continuing). With this law or with the other law or with the order of the President. Now, certainly——

Mr. DEMPSEY. Of such act.

Mr. FESS. Certainly the President could make an order under this to set aside a liability. That is plain.

Mr. LENROOT. He certainly could with this language.

Mr. FESS. That is the plain reading of it.

Mr. LENROOT. Because when you insert here "any order of the President," that says that there shall be a right of action against the carrier, but if the President orders otherwise there shall be no right of action at all.

That is exactly what it means. It can not mean anything else, and I can not see how anyone on either side of the aisle can be willing to jeopardize the right of the 1,700,000 employees and the greater number of shippers not having the right of action to remedy their wrong. The power ought not to be left with any man to say whether or not there shall be a remedy for a wrong that exists. If this is left in the bill, we will give to the President of the United States a greater power than was ever given any monarch upon earth. It puts him above all law and says, "Although we are enacting law, Mr. President, any time you say so the law shall have no application whatever."

Mr. PLATT. Should not the very awkward language be corrected so as to read, "the carriers while under Federal control shall, except"——

Mr. LENROOT. Except what?

Mr. PLATT. "Except in so far as are inconsistent with the provisions of this act," and so forth?

Mr. LENROOT. That would do it. I think you would accomplish the same thing if you would leave out "or with any order of the President," because then it will be subject, and ought to be subject, to all liabilities that are not inconsistent with this act—by the act of Federal control.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I will withdraw my substitute in favor of the substitute suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT]. I think his is very much better than mine.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment by way of a substitute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] offers an amendment by way of a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, on page 11, line 24, amend so as to read as follows:

The carriers while under Federal control shall be subject to all loss and liabilities as common carriers, whether arising under State or Federal laws or as common law, except in so far as may be inconsistent with the provisions——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will have to reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. PLATT. It is all in here except the express provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send it up.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the proposed substitute does not include the words "the order of the President," let us vote on this, and then the gentleman can offer his amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have presented an amendment to the pending bill as it stands at the present time, or, rather, an amendment to the Sweet amendment to said bill, as follows:

Provided, In the event freight rates are increased under this act over present existing rates, said increase shall not apply to or affect the rates as to shipments of live stock and grain commonly used as foodstuffs.

If there are two things certain at this time, one is that the allies are going to win this war, and the second is that the food production of the United States is and will continue to be an important factor in winning the war.

We are legislating on a very important matter at this time and there ought not to be any obstruction or impediment placed upon food production in this country.

As this bill stood before the Sweet amendment was adopted it vested some authority with the President, which I believe was the proper thing under the present existing emergency circumstances growing out of the war.

The Sweet amendment takes some authority from the President as provided in the bill in its original form and vests it with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and unless the Sweet amendment is defeated when the matter comes up for final passage, I consider it highly important to the meat and grain producers that the amendment which I offer to the Sweet amendment be adopted.

In brief, the Government takes over the railroads as a war necessity, and agrees for the use of said property to pay a standard return to them. The bill provides that after paying the standard return which is derived from the operating income of the railroads, if there is any operating income left over, the same shall be paid into the United States Treasury, and it is right under present existing conditions that such excess over the standard return should go to the Government. Now, suppose the operating income from the railroads is not sufficient to pay the standard return to the roads. In that event the Government agrees to make it up. So far as I am individually concerned, it is my opinion that we should not increase the freight rates, at least to any material extent, on the shipments of live stock and grain, such as corn and wheat. Now, in the event the freight rate is increased on these products of the farm and by virtue of that increase more income is derived from operating the railroads than is necessary to pay the standard return, the surplus will be paid into the United States Treasury. You will then find yourself in the attitude of requiring him who produces the food products to pay an additional sum in the way of increased rates, a part of which may go to the public. Would it not be better and more just not to require the farmer or producer of these food products to pay that increase, and if it must be met, let it be met by all the people through the Government? The farmer at the present time is not engaged altogether in a work solely beneficial to himself, but is putting forth an extra effort to produce food products for our Nation and its allies. In other words, he is also working for his country, thereby performing a public service. And I would prefer to encourage him and not add any extra burden to his condition. I hope you may agree with me in this, and if not, then at least that we leave the matter to the President to consider this matter, rather than to leave it where the Sweet amendment now places it. I think the farmer is now paying a fair rate for his shipments of stock and grain. The railroads were not taken over by the Government for the farmers' benefit solely, but for the public benefit. Then why should an increased rate be forced upon him? The railroads having been taken over for the public benefit, why not the public or whole people bear this burden in case a deficiency is to be made up, in case such deficiency should arise?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has that permission under the general order of the House. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROMJUE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, beginning with the word "section," in line 24, strike out all to and including the period on line 4, page 12, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That the carriers, while under Federal control, shall be subject to all laws and liabilities as common carriers, whether arising under State or Federal laws or at common law, except in so far as may be inconsistent with the provisions of this act or any other act applicable to such Federal control."

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, this amendment which I have put in writing is simply a transposition of the words, so as to state the thing affirmatively. It has already been adopted in a negative form. It is the same thing.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. The gentleman's amendment does not cover "so far as is not inconsistent with Federal control"?

Mr. PLATT. Oh, yes. I have the same thing here. If it is not the same, it should be. It is the same, except that it is transposed.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] whether or not he believes the words "or with any order of the President," on page 12, give the President all the power he would have under the provision that was stricken out under the Towner amendment?

Mr. BARKLEY. No. It has no relationship to what the President orders, but has relationship to Federal control itself.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Who will determine what is inconsistent with the principle of Federal control?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is a judicial question, a matter of law. It provides that Federal control shall not be inconsistent with itself.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The gentleman from Kentucky propounded a query to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] in which he inquired whether that language did not give the President the power which the gentleman from Iowa was seeking to strike out.

Mr. BARKLEY. The distinguished gentleman from Iowa answered in the negative.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. What is the gentleman's opinion?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think it does not. I do not think the words "order of the President" and the words "consistent with Federal control" are inconsistent terms. I think the words "Federal control" ought to be in there.

Mr. PLATT. My language is "not inconsistent with this act or any other act applicable to Federal control." I think that covers it. It states it affirmatively.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I think the gentleman is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the ending of the first paragraph on page 13, beginning on line 8, at the word "That," which reads, "That nothing in this act shall be construed to amend, repeal," and so forth, as amended by what is known as the Caraway amendment, which has just been adopted by the committee, be transposed to the end of this act and be known as section 16. The language does not relate itself pertinently to the section in which it is found, or to any other section in the bill. Therefore I think, as a matter of form, it had better go to the end of the bill. The Senate has adopted language similar to that found in this bill unamended, and has put it at the end of its bill as a proviso. I think the better form would be to put it as a separate section.

Mr. TOWNER. I think the gentleman's idea is exactly correct, and I suggest to the gentleman that these two very important parts of section 11 ought really to be separated into two sections. If they are numbered as separate sections, will not the gentleman's object be accomplished?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Perhaps so; but I think this particular section had better go at the end of the bill. It would save renumbering other sections. That is the only reason. I just wanted to save time. I think the gentleman's suggestion is a good one.

Mr. TOWNER. That can be taken care of in conference.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the language which the Clerk will report be transposed to the end of the bill and offered as a new section.

Mr. SIMS. Including the Caraway amendment.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The language as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the language.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 8, after the word "interest," "that nothing in this act shall be construed to amend, repeal, impair, or affect the existing laws or powers of the States in relation to taxation."

Mr. MONTAGUE. That language as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the language that has just been read, as amended by the Caraway amendment, may be transferred to the end of the bill and placed there as a new section, to be numbered section 16. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that, on page 12, the word "suits," in line 5, be changed to "actions at law or suits in equity," and I make a similar request as to the word "suit," in line 7.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent for the adoption of the amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BARKLEY: Page 12, line 5, strike out the word "suits" and insert in lieu thereof the words "actions at law or suits in equity"; page 12, line 7, strike out the word "suit" and insert in lieu thereof the words "action at law or suit in equity."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman whether "actions at law" in a legislative enactment do not include suits in equity?

Mr. BARKLEY. In some jurisdictions there is a doubt about it, and that is the reason I offer the amendment, in order that there may be no doubt at all about it.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no question that "suits" includes both actions at law and suits in equity.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. A suit is a suit, whether in law or in equity, as the language of the bill reads.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, has not all time for debate expired?

The CHAIRMAN. All time for debate has expired.

Mr. SIMS. But we are debating.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] asked unanimous consent, and the gentleman from Wisconsin reserved the right to object.

Mr. SIMS. He offered an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. He asked unanimous consent to offer an amendment. Is there objection to agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That every person or corporation, whether carrier or shipper, or any receiver, trustee, lessee, agent, or person acting for or employed by a carrier or shipper, or other person, who shall knowingly violate or fail to observe any of the provisions of this act, or shall knowingly interfere with or impede the possession, use, operation, or control of any railroad property, railroad, or transportation system hitherto or hereafter taken over by the Pesident, or shall knowingly violate any of the provisions of any order or regulation made in pursuance of this act, or of any other act concerning such possession, use, operation, or control, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction, be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000, or, if a person, by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both. Each independent transaction constituting a violation of or a failure to observe any of the provisions of this act, or any order entered in pursuance hereof, shall constitute a separate offense. For the taking or conversion to his own use or the embezzlement of money or property derived from or used in connection with the possession, use, or operation of said railroads or transportation systems, the criminal statutes of the United States, as well as the criminal statutes of the various States where applicable, shall apply to all officers, agents, and employees engaged in said railroad and transportation service while the same is under Federal control to the same extent as to persons employed in the regular service of the United States. Prosecutions for violations of this act or of any order entered hereunder shall be in the district courts of the United States, under the direction of the Attorney General, in accordance with the procedure for the collection and imposing of fines and penalties now existing in said courts.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order to ask the chairman of the committee a question. On page 13, line 14, occur the words "who shall knowingly violate or fail to observe any of the provisions of this act." Could one plead ignorance of the law, and under these words would that be a complete defense?

Mr. SIMS. Ignorance of the law excuses no one.

Mr. FESS. I understand; but this says "shall knowingly."

Mr. BARKLEY. That legally means intentionally.

Mr. SIMS. That means with intent to violate the law. In the committee I personally objected to putting in the word "knowingly," but the committee put it in, and there is not enough in it to make it worth while to spend any time over it.

Mr. FESS. It is the judgment of the committee, then, that "knowingly" inserted in the bill would not allow anyone to plead ignorance of the law?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, certainly not. It means with criminal intent.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, after line 17, insert a new section to read as follows:

"SEC. —. That moneys and other property derived from the operation of the carriers during Federal control are hereby declared to be the property of the United States. Unless otherwise directed by the President, such money shall not be covered into the Treasury, but such moneys and property shall remain in the custody of the same officers and the accounting thereof shall be in the same manner and form as before Federal control. Disbursements therefrom shall, without further appropriation, be made in the same manner as before Federal control, and for such purposes as under the Interstate Commerce Commission classification of accounts in force on December 27, 1917, are chargeable to operating expenses or to railway tax accruals, and for such other purposes in connection with Federal control as the President may direct, except that taxes under Titles 1 and 11 of the act entitled 'An act to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes,' approved October 3, 1917, or any act in addition thereto or in amendment thereof, shall be paid by the carrier out of its own funds. If Federal control begins or ends during the tax year for which any taxes so chargeable to railway tax accruals are assessed, the taxes for such year shall be apportioned to the date of the beginning or ending of such Federal control, and disbursements shall be made only for that portion of such taxes as is due for the part of such tax year which falls within the period of Federal control.

"Such custody and disbursement shall, however, be subject to the direction of the President, and all officers and employees having custody or control of any of such moneys or property shall be subject to all criminal laws regarding the custody and control of public moneys or property so far as not inconsistent herewith.

"At such periods as the President may direct, the books shall be closed and the balance of revenue over disbursements shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the revolving fund created by this act. If such revenues are insufficient to meet such disbursements, the deficit shall be paid out of such revolving fund in such manner as the President may direct."

Mr. SIMS. I will not object to the amendment if it is satisfactory to others.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. I glean from the reading of the amendment that all revenues are to be the property of the United States. Is it intended that they shall remain the property at all times after the roads are turned back into private control?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; any moneys derived from the operation during Federal control will remain the property of the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was under the impression that the bill was founded on the idea that the moneys accruing from operation at the termination of control by the Government should be turned back to the respective companies.

Mr. LENROOT. The money in the Treasury?

Mr. STAFFORD. The balance remaining after the various deductions necessary for operation.

Mr. LENROOT. That must be a matter of accounting. After the accounting the railroads will owe us so much or we will owe the railroads so much.

Mr. STAFFORD. On what basis? Assume that the Pennsylvania Railroad, for instance, has been making large returns while under Government control, and that there will be a surplus accruing to the railroad after paying it the standard return. Under the amendment of the gentleman there will be no return whatever to the private owners of the roads—to the companies—but these returns would go to the Government.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly; they ought to. It is Government money. We are paying the railroads a billion dollars a year, and we must turn the roads back in as good shape as when we received them, but they are not entitled to any of the revenues. I think there are two or three things that should be considered in conference. Of course, the moneys that are derived during Federal control must be the moneys of the Government. Certainly if we had a billion dollars surplus at the end of Federal control we ought not to give it to the railroads. The bill expressly provides that any excess of operating revenue from operating expenses shall go into the revolving fund. This amendment is necessary for the reason that if this is Government money, without the legislation, under the present law, the money could not be retained, but must go into the Treasury, and this permits the moneys to be used as they have been used, subject to the control of the President at all times.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is it not true that the Government pays the Pennsylvania or these other roads for the use of the roads?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes. It will be noticed, in reference to the war taxes, that the bill in its present form provides they shall pay war taxes only in case of agreement. Of course, the Government should not pay any war tax if the railroad does not agree. The corporation should pay the war tax, and not the Government. While the Government would be compelled to pay the ordinary taxes, it should not pay the war taxes of a nonagreeing railroad. Again, we took over the railroads in December, and we ought not to be charged for taxes which were payable in February for the previous year. The Government ought not to be charged with all of the taxes assessed against railroads during the previous year. This amendment takes care of that. I think the amendment is very important and necessary.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to favor the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin on the ground that it is providing for a contingency that may happen, although it is one which, in my judgment, is extremely remote. I do not believe there will ever be a dollar accrue to the Government to which this amendment will apply. We have taken as a standard of compensation for the railways three of the most prosperous years we can find. What we will have over will be what any company should happen to make above the average for those three years.

In that connection must also be considered the amount necessary for the administration of this law. Some railroad official who was before the committee, and whose name I have forgotten, said, in respect to this revolving fund, that the only way it could be considered as a revolving fund was that it pertained to wheels, because that would be the only thing revolving in connection with it; that nothing would ever revolve back into the Federal Treasury. I am satisfied that he was right. This will cost our Government over the $500,000,000 now appropriated, and any sum which by any possibility comes into the Treasury by reason of some railroad happening to make an excess over the three-year period. We already have a large number of high-salaried men employed in connection with this plan we are carrying out with reference to the control of railroads. As yet I have not heard of a single individual whose services are dispensed with, and I do not believe any will be discharged. Already we have had several new bureaus created, with an extensive array of stenographers and clerks. There has been some talk of cutting the salaries of certain railroad officials, who, as it seems to many of us, are drawing exorbitant salaries, but I have no faith that this will be done. In the meantime prices of materials are steadily rising, and it is understood that the wages of the employees are to be increased. Some slight economies have been effected by taking off trains and thereby discommoding the public, but the saving is slight compared to the increase in expense.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does not the gentleman from Iowa believe that this contingency might arise by the exercise of the power to raise rates that is in this bill?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The contingency might arise in that kind of way, but why it should arise would be more than I can imagine. Gentlemen talk about having the rates raised, but why should they be raised—to bring a profit to the Government beyond a reasonable amount? The bill provides that rates shall be just and fair and reasonable. They ought not to be raised to bring in any profit to the Government. Indeed they can not be raised for that purpose, if we comply with the terms of the bill. I am hoping, however, without much basis for my hope, that the whole of this gigantic sum of five hundred millions will not be absorbed in this undertaking. Government operation of railroads is, in a sense, on trial. It would not, of course, be entirely fair to test it solely by the total expense in times like these. If, however, we find the only difference is a large increase in the number of officials, an increased operating expense, fewer trains, higher rates, and poorer service, the Nation certainly will not consider any plan to purchase the railroads when the war is over.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "knowingly," in line 14, page 13, and insert in lieu thereof the word "willfully."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 14, strike out the word "knowingly" and insert in lieu thereof the word "willfully."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That all pending cases in the courts of the United States affecting railroads or other transportation systems brought under the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as amended and supplemented, including the commodities clause, so called, or under the act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies, approved July 2, 1890, and amendments thereto, shall proceed to final determination as soon as may be, as if the United States had not assumed control of transportation systems; but in any such case the court having jurisdiction may upon the application of the United States stay execution of final judgment or decree until the further action of Congress in respect of control of transportation systems by the United States.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, line 5, strike out the words "until the further action of Congress in respect of control of transportation systems by the United States," and insert in lieu thereof the words "until such time as it shall deem proper."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, if I may say a word on that——

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, there is no contest on the amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That the Federal control of railroads and transportation systems herein and heretofore provided for shall continue for and during the period of the war and for a reasonable time thereafter, which shall not exceed two years next following the date of the proclamation by the President of the exchange of ratifications of the treaty of peace: Provided, however, That the President may, prior to July 1, 1918, relinquish control of all or any part of any railroad or system of transportation, further Federal control of which the President shall deem not needful or desirable; and the President may at any time during the period of Federal control agree with the owners thereof to relinquish all or any part of any railroad or system of transportation; and no right to compensation shall accrue to such owners from and after the date of relinquishment for the property so relinquished.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, before that is read I desire to make an inquiry. Is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky to strike out?

Mr. BARKLEY. It is to strike out and insert.

Mr. ESCH. I want to offer an amendment reducing the period from two to one year. Would not that have priority, as perfecting the text?

The CHAIRMAN. A motion to perfect the text would have priority over a motion to strike out.

Mr. ESCH. Then I would like to offer that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not yet know what the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky is. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BARKLEY: Page 15, line 10, after the word "war," strike out all down to and including the word "peace," in line 13, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "and until Congress shall thereafter otherwise provide."

The CHAIRMAN. This is a motion to strike out and insert, and in that respect is in itself an amendment to perfect, so the Chair is not prepared to say that the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin would take precedence over this amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. STAFFORD. To make a suggestion, if the Chair will indulge me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman with pleasure.

Mr. STAFFORD. The definitive proposition submitted to the committee by the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky is that instead of a time limit, as provided in the bill itself, it shall be dependent upon some action of Congress, whereas the proposed amendment suggested by my colleague was to bring before the House a vote on the most specific provision of the existing paragraph.

If the one-year proposal was submitted and voted upon, you could get the contested judgment of the committee on that before you would submit the question as to whether they wished to make a more indefinite proposal conditioned upon Congress to act. We should try always, I take it, to submit amendments whereby the judgment of the committee may first be obtained on the proposals contained in the bill before submitting something of an entirely different character. The amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky is something of a different character from that which is proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I submit they both stand on the same footing as to striking out and inserting. Of course they may be of a different character, and one may be more definite than the other. I do not see in that case where one takes precedence—that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin takes precedence over the other under the rule—because they are both amendments to strike out and insert.

Mr. SABATH. The Chair does not know what the amendment proposed to be offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin may be.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman stated what his amendment would be. The Chair does not see, from a parliamentary standpoint, any difference in the two amendments. The amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky is a motion to strike out and insert. The amendment to be proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin would take precedence over a motion to strike out, but the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky is a motion to strike out and insert, and it is therefore a perfecting motion. So far as the parliamentary situation is concerned, the Chair is unable to distinguish between the two.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Would not this be true? Could not the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin be offered as a substitute for the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky?

The CHAIRMAN. Quite likely that is true.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. In that event that would be voted upon first.

The CHAIRMAN. It would be voted upon first if offered as a substitute and it was germane.

Mr. BARKLEY. I want to make a parliamentary inquiry of the Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Whether the gentleman from Wisconsin could offer his amendment, which is a motion to strike out and insert, to my amendment, which is a similar motion. As far as I am concerned, I have no preference as to which one of those amendments should be voted on first.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the gentleman from Wisconsin could offer the amendment which he indicated he would propose as a substitute for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky, in which event the vote would come first upon the amendment offered by way of substitute by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BARKLEY. May I suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin that he offer his amendment and have both up at the same time for discussion?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield the floor?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield for that purpose if the gentleman desires to do it. I do not care to suggest it unless the gentleman desires to do so.

Mr. SIMS. That is a very good way to get the thing through as soon as possible. Personally, I would like to see the gentleman's amendment voted upon first.

Mr. ESCH. I have no objection to the gentleman from Kentucky proceeding. My amendment was to strike out in line 12 the word "two" and insert the word "one," and strike out "years" and insert "year."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, this is similar to the amendment which Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska indicated he would offer, but he is temporarily out of the Chamber. I do not know that I can add anything material to what I said in general debate upon the subject of the limitation of the tenure of Government control. I do not think that in all the history of this Government there has been such a large transfer of property involving so much that affects the commercial welfare and economic conditions of our country as the taking over of the railroads by the Government of the United States, and I do not believe there is any man now in Congress or elsewhere who is wise enough to forecast at this time what legislation will be necessary in turning those roads back to their owners, if they are turned back, after the war is concluded. The Government of Great Britain at the very beginning of the war took possession and assumed control of the British railways. In the North American Review for February Mr. Sidney Brooks, a very well known and prominent English journalist and publicist, in discussing British railways, had the following to say:

It has become progressively clearer and clearer that the railways can not, when the war is over, go back to their old positions and their old methods. Finance alone forbids it. The railway men have received in the past three years three successive additions of 5 shillings a week to their wages. They have been disguised under the name of war-bonuses, but nobody that I know of expects them to disappear with the war. On the conclusion of peace the companies will find themselves faced with an increase of considerably over £20,000,000 a year in their wages bill. This sum exceeds by several millions the amount—some £17,000,000—paid out in 1913 as dividend on the ordinary stock. But that is not all. The cost of material has risen by about 60 per cent, the increase is not likely to be scaled down for many years to come, and another huge item is thus added to the working expenses. Moreover all the companies are behindhand with renewals and repairs; their good will, the creation of decades of assiduous labor, has been profoundly affected by a war that has played havoc with the normal channels of trade; some lines have been involuntarily advanced to a position of unwonted importance; others, through no fault of their own, have had to yield ground; and the State, which is responsible for these upheavals, can not, when peace returns, wash its hands of the immense problems of reconstruction they will bequeath.

Were the Government to follow any such course, were it to terminate its contract on the conclusion of peace, and to leave the railways to work out their own salvation, the result would be, first, that the companies as a whole would be hard put to it to pay any dividends at all on their guaranteed and preference stocks; secondly, that the dividends on the ordinary stock, representing nearly £500,000,000 of paid-up capital, would be wiped out; and, thirdly, that the directors would all but inevitably be driven to raise their rates just at a time when the national chances of recovering from the devastation of the war and of competing successfully in international trade would largely depend on cheap transportation. The consequences of such a solution have only to be faced to put it out of court as impossible.

There remain, therefore, two alternatives. One is that the Government should itself acquire the railways by purchase and operate them as it operates the post office; in other words, that the railway system of the United Kingdom should be nationalized. The other is that some such plan as has been found admirably effective in time of war should be continued into the years of peace, and that in return for a financial guaranty the State should assume control of general railway policy, should insist on the companies being worked together as they are now being worked together, and should require the adoption of the reforms, the almost innumerable reforms, that the companies have too long resisted and that the pressure of the war has forced upon them. The choice will be between Government ownership and operation on the one hand, and a far more thorough-going and rational system of State regulation and control and of State responsibility on the other.

He goes on to the conclusion that in England the British railways when the war is over will be met with two propositions, one of them Government ownership absolutely or Government control, under a unified system of legislation and control similar to that which has grown up during the war. Now, that situation is going to confront the railways of the United States. We are liable to spend in betterments and improvements and the purchase of equipment and building of terminals and other facilities necessary for the carrying on of this war a billion dollars, and if the war continues for two or three years we are liable to spend a billion and a half or two billions of dollars in aiding these railroads and making improvements. Because it was stated before the joint commission of the House and Senate that in order to keep up the railways adequately to meet the conditions even of peace it was necessary to expend $1,000,000,000 a year in extensions, betterments, and equipment, and if that were necessary in times of peace, certainly that will not be an exaggerated sum that it will be necessary to spend by the Government of the United States in times of war. Not only that, but the financial affairs of our Government, entangled as they inevitably must become with the railroads during Federal control, will be of such condition and nature that the United States Government can not wisely, from a financial or economic standpoint, turn these railroads back to private control subject to the old competitive methods without providing adequate legislation for the unification of railways after the war is over.

Now, it has come to my knowledge within the last few days that financial institutions are at this very time undertaking to hold up the Government of the United States, and railroads that are either in receiverships or liable to be placed under receiverships during Federal control, because they say that, "Under the terms of this bill you provide that automatically the roads come back to private ownership after two years have elapsed from the day of peace, and, therefore, we do not know when you are going to turn them back upon us, and when you do turn them back, if adequate provision has not been made for all these entangling alliances between the Government and the railroads, the stocks may go down and we be left to hold the bag." And because of that condition financial institutions that are now being depended on, both by the railroads and by the Government, are holding up or displaying a disposition to take advantage of that uncertain and chaotic condition to make harder terms either upon the Government or the railroads than would otherwise be the case if they were sure that before these railroads are turned back to the old chaotic and confused conditions that brought about a breaking down of the railroad system of the United States, the Government and the railroads would be able to obtain better terms from those upon whom they depend for financial support.

Mr. DEMPSEY. As I understand the gentleman, his argument is based upon the probability that the railroads will be in a bad condition financially at the end of the war. Is the gentleman advised that this is the condition in England, namely, that since the war England has paid from operating revenue the dividends paid in the prewar period, and has paid 5 per cent upon all nondividend-paying roads, has carried soldiers without charge, and has carried half of the munitions without charge? Now, I am advised by experts that that is the fact. Is that in accordance with the gentleman's information?

Mr. BARKLEY. Not precisely. I think there are some commodities that the Government has hauled without charge itself, because not to do so would be simply taking the money out of one pocket and putting it into another.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Take the question of paying prewar dividends, and in all cases 5 per cent war dividends had not been paid. Is that in accordance with the gentleman's information?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is substantially true, but the Government has borne all increases of wages out of its Treasury, but this can not happen under private control.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Would not that mean that the railroads, instead of being in bad condition financially, would be in a vastly improved condition financially at the end of this war?

Mr. BARKLEY. But the British interests are going to inherit just what the American railroads are going to inherit, unless there is some provision for coordinating the expenses and the receipts of these railroads; and under the amendment which has been adopted by the House, known as the Sweet amendment, I am very much afraid that notwithstanding the increase in expenses the Government of the United States will have no power whatever to increase the revenues of the railroads, and if that should happen they will inherit a vastly increased expense without increasing the revenues. And these things ought to be left to a future Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

Mr. SIMS. How much time has the gentleman from Kentucky already had?

The CHAIRMAN. Ten minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask unanimous consent that all debate on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] close in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent——

Mr. SIMS. I did not mean 30 minutes. I mean 20 minutes. He has already had 10.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that all debate on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] shall conclude in 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that all debate upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky shall be concluded in 20 minutes. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GILLETT. In that 20 minutes has the gentleman from Kentucky been recognized yet?

The CHAIRMAN. The request of the gentleman from Kentucky has not yet been acted upon by the House.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does that give me the five additional minutes that I have asked for?

The CHAIRMAN. No. The question is upon the motion made by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. CANNON. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. SIMS. A motion is pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate will be concluded in 20 minutes. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] asks unanimous consent to proceed five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LENROOT. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does any member of the committee demand recognition?

Mr. ESCH. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] restores the original draft of the bill, to the effect that Federal control shall continue until Congress orders otherwise. The committee, after two days' deliberation, agreed upon a term of two years. The Senate bill provides for 18 months.

We are convinced that there should be a definite and specific term for the period of Federal control, for the reason that the railroads were taken under the war power, under the act of 1916, as a purely war measure. They were not taken under the commerce clause of the Constitution. They were taken under the war power. The power controlling possession of them therefore should terminate at the time the war terminates. The courts would construe a year as a reasonable time after the conclusion of war through a declaration of peace.

We fixed that limit in our amendment. We believe that it will be ample time for Congress to make the necessary financial readjustments that will be required as a result of the changed status of the roads during the period of war control; for be it remembered that under the terms of the amendment I have offered it will be one year after the proclamation of the ratification of peace, and it will doubtless take many months before terms of peace can be agreed upon. During this period of time Congress will be in session. Congress can enact the necessary legislation, and then have one year additional in which to make the necessary adjustments.

It does not seem to me that we are asking an unreasonable thing, in view of the fact that the roads are being held under the war power, and that within the period of one year after the conclusion of the war by the proclamation of the ratification of peace they can be returned to their owners. We ought to make the contract now. We should fix in the terms of this contract its duration, just as we do when we make any other contract or lease. Therefore, in my opinion, by leaving it wide open, without making any definite term, we are inviting that very uncertainty which some have said would lead to financial chaos. It seems to me a contradiction of terms to say that by fixing the time of the Government's tenure you invite uncertainty and chaos. To me the opposite is true. When you leave the term indefinite yo uinvite uncertainty, you promote speculation, and you bring about the very condition that you wish to ward off.

Mr. COADY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Maryland?

Mr. ESCH. I just have five minutes.

Mr. COADY. Just for a question.

Mr. ESCH. What is it?

Mr. COADY. I think the gentleman's suggestion is that one year after the termination of war, or one year after the close of the war——

Mr. ESCH. I use the same language as is in the bill, "after the declaration of peace."

Mr. COADY. Does the gentleman move to strike out the word "two" and insert "one"?

Mr. ESCH. I have had my amendment read for information.

Mr. COADY. Does the gentleman think one year would be sufficient?

Mr. ESCH. I have tried to argue that.

Mr. COADY. Suppose the war terminated on the 4th of March, at the termination of one Congress. The next Congress would not meet until the next December. Then Congress would have at that session only three months in which to act upon it.

Mr. ESCH. I do not think there is much force to that contention, because this is a matter of nation-wide concern, and this great problem of the future 260,000 miles of railroad would be of sufficient importance for any President, I do not care who he might be, to call a special session of Congress in order to pass the necessary legislation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ESCH. I can not yield, Mr. Chairman. I have only two minutes remaining, and the gentleman had 10 minutes. It seems to me that if we fix no definite time you are putting this whole great question into the form of a political issue; you make it the football of politics. We do not want to do that. We want to fix the term now. We will have time enough for the necessary legislation. The longer the time, the greater will be the financial interest in and obligation of the Government as to these carriers, and the more difficult it will be to unscramble the financial situation. That would be another reason in my mind why we should make as speedy a termination of this situation after peace comes as we can; that the roads may be returned to their owners under such laws as Congress shall enact. [Applause.]

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the question has been pretty thoroughly discussed in general debate, but before this vote is taken I would like to remind you, one and all, just what the vote means. There is no use dodging it or trying to dodge it. A vote for the Barkley amendment means a vote in favor of passing remedial legislation before the railroads are given back to the private owners. That is what it means, and you need not dodge it. [Applause.] If you are afraid to trust the people of the United States to pass upon this question in their wisdom, then vote to put the stop watch on. It has been said, and said truly—said by distinguished men—that this vote means an advantage to one side or the other. The two sides are these: There are some people in the United States so afraid of what they call Government ownership that they would vote these roads back into the hands of the private owners without regard to whether the rights of the American people are protected before they are voted back or not, in order to avoid what they honestly believe is a great danger in Government ownership. Now, gentlemen, let the lamp of experience guide our feet. Who here this afternoon is so wise as to say what the situation in the United States will be when the war is over? We already know of much legislation that was needed before the roads were taken over. Do you mean to say that we will learn nothing during this Federal control that might be of benefit to us in enacting legislation for the regulation or control of the railroads after the war is over? Then, why not give the people at home a chance to speak? I admit frankly that if you put in this limitation it will make it harder for the people to carry ouf their will, if they should come to a decision as to doing something else about the railroads in America. But what business is it of ours to say that they shall not have as much time as they want to settle this question? How much more time have I, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two minutes.

Mr. DECKER. You say two years is ample time. Two years is ample provided we have no other questions to settle when this awful struggle is over. You say two years are enough. Then I look you in the face and ask you, Why have we not enacted legislation already regulating the issuance of railroad stocks and bonds in this country? Is there a Congressman here who dares tell his constituents that that kind of legislation has not been needed for 10 years? Since I have been a Member of Congress, in the last four years, we have passed a bill of that kind through the House twice, but still it is not enacted into law. The gentleman on the other side says that two years is ample time in which to settle all the questions, which we must admit will be greater then than they are now, before we turn the railroads back. If you believe that, vote to put in the limitation; but if in your heart you want to protect the American people against such outrages as happened to the New Haven, the Rock Island, and the Frisco, then do not vote for a limitation. Do not vote for a limitation and then go back home and tell the American people that you are a friend of the shipper and the investor, and that you are against the robbery and the looting of the railroad systems of this country.

I do not believe that all railroad men are dishonest, but everybody knows that some of them have been dishonest; and until we get some railroad legislation in this country that will protect investors and that will see to it that money paid for railroad stocks and bonds is put into ties and rails and locomotives and cars instead of into the pockets of railroad officials, then, and not until then, will the American investing public have some confidence in our railroad systems.

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DECKER. I have not the time to yield; my time is about up. I want to say in closing that you can act now and protect the American people. They are the ones that have the right to speak on this question. It is their money, not yours and mine, that is voted into these systems at this time in order to take care of the situation caused by private owners' inability to carry on the transportation of this country. It may be a billion dollars or it may be two billion dollars, but, whatever it is, it is their money. Why not give them a chance to speak before you turn them back to private owners? Ah, there will be other questions confronting the American people; their hearts will be sad; they will be troubled with the mighty questions to settle. Why say that the great railroad question has got to be settled on a given day? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I confess I approach the question of railroad management with a good deal of hesitation, because I do not want to appear to know too much about the operation of railroads or too much about that line of business. My chief experience with the railroads has been that of a passenger, and, as far as I could see, the business was profitable.

I have been brought up in a different atmosphere. I never drew a railroad salary, but have heard considerable about them. I think, from custom or otherwise, the high salaries paid railroad officials have been a source of criticism, if not a burden to the companies.

But I wish for a few minutes, however presumptious it may appear, to speak briefly concerning the bill we have been considering for the last few days, and which is now before the House, for the control of the railroads by the Federal Government and the just compensation therefor.

It is common knowledge that agriculture, manufacturing, and commerce are the greatest industries and most vitally affect the welfare of our country. They are interwoven with the progress and prosperity of our Nation and the happiness of our people.

I am in favor of this bill for two reasons which appear to me very essential: First, I am in favor of taking over the railroads as a war measure, and I do not see how there can be a proper conduct of the war without the facility of the railroads in the transportation of our troops, war munitions, and supplies. The railroads and transportation facilities, including our waterways and navigation, are essential. With 3,000 miles of ocean traffic, the taking over of our shipping is as vital and essential in the conduct of the war as the taking over of the railroads.

Second, I am also in favor of taking over the railroads in order to coordinate the facilities of transportation during the war as a means of procuring the utmost efficiency. In the conduct of the war economy, efficiency, development, and industry will count most, and I do not think that crosshauls, empty trains, or double service tend to best results. I am not only for coordinating the railroads of our country but I am also for coordinating every great branch of industry, including the man power, in the development of the needed resources of our country in winning the war. I am for subscribing every American citizen, male and female, to a pledge devoting his best energy, his property, and his life in the successful prosecution of the war. There can be no division among us. Every man must now do his duty in the hour of his country's need and of his country's danger. It is self-evident to everyone now that the war must be won by the United States. Dissension, sedition, and pro-German sentiment must all be suppressed in the interest of unity, strength, and success. I know there are many splendid citizens of German birth and German descent who are loyal to our country, who have a double burden to bear, and who are rallying to our defense, enlisting in our Army, in opposition to their ancestry, but whose fealty and loyalty to our flag is paramount. A pro-German alien enemy, of whatever nationality, going at large in the United States among our citizens at the present time is more dangerous than if he were in the ranks of the German Army.

I am for coordinating and uniting the citizens of the United States like one man. I am for the coordination of every South American Republic, Canada, and Mexico, so that the Western Hemisphere can present a united front for the prosecution of the war; I am for inviting and procuring the active aid and support of Japan, which has promised its assistance; I am for organizing China, with its great man power; and in every way availing ourselves not only of the armies and navies of friendly nations but of their man power and great resources as well in fighting Germany. I say Germany because Germany is responsible for the war, is undertaking to set up an autocratic monarchy to rule the world, and we are all opposed to that. I understand that in war it is easier to give advice and to say what one should do and what ought to be done than it is to consummate and bring about the result. I do not make this suggestion by way of criticism but as expressing my own conviction. Nor am I banking upon the fact that I always have advocated and voted for preparedness. It is a great step from a peace to a war basis. I had always hoped that the brightest pages of American history would be adorned with peaceful pursuits, art, the progress of agriculture, science, and invention rather than our martial achievements. But we have engaged in the greatest war of all times, and, while there are different opinions about our policy of declaring war and the progress we have made, may I say that there never was a more just war, or one contending for higher or more far-reaching or more beneficial results and principles than the present war.

Of course, just compensation for the use of the railroads must be made to the owners. I think a very good solution of what amount of compensation ought to be made to them is contained in the bill, and that the average annual earnings of these roads for the three prewar years of 1914, 1915, and 1916 is a safe standard. The bill contains an appropriation of $500,000,000 as an operating fund, to which will be added the earnings of the railroads, and out of which they can be paid for their use, maintenance, upkeep, interest, and other expenditures. It seems to me this is a reasonably fair rule for just compensation, and certainly no one wishes to be unfair or confiscatory in relation to what should be paid to the owners of the railroads any more than they would for the just compensation for property of individuals taken over by the Government.

Neither am I afraid of the rate-fixing power provided in the bill. At the present time the railroads fix the rates, and this rate, upon the complaint of any shipper, can be reviewed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. We have a Food Administrator controlling the food situation of the country. We have a Fuel Administrator controlling the fuel situation of the country. The President has, in numerous instances, fixed the price of food products and cereals and the price of fuel. Some one has stated that he fixed the price of demurrage. Also that he did not fix the price of fuel satisfactorily or the price of wheat, and that the demurrage of $10 per car a day only lasted overnight. But the President changed them upon complaint of the people, and it is not reasonable to think that the rate fixed for the common carrier will be unreasonable, even if the President is given that power. I do not think, with public opinion and public censorship, that the President will arbitrarily make an unjust or exorbitant rate. Personally, I would be pleased if the President, by and with the advice of the Interstate Commerce Commission, would fix the rates, and that the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has had great experience and long service in the fixing of rates, has made thousands of decisions and written thousands of opinions in reference to rates, might in some way be preserved and coordinated in the fixing of rates. But this is an administration bill. I am not afraid that the rate purposely or arbitrarily will be made unjust by any President. The power given the President over the control of railroads ends in two years after the war, and the right of the President to fix the rates will likewise end.

We are fighting a great war. We can not hope for success without organization. The armies of all times have had one superior chieftain or commander, and for effective fighting there must be unity in this war all along the line. Some one must lead, and the quicker we determine upon some one for the final say, or who will have the last word, the better work and assurance of success will follow. A large amount of transportation during the war will be troops and munitions. If the Government must pay the standard rate as fixed by the average paid during the three prewar periods, and if the Government must pay for the transportation of its troops and of munitions of war, it will be largely a matter of bookkeeping and of keeping track of the amounts of shipping done and passengers carried. If that rate be high more will flow into the Treasury than would if the rate be low, but the final balance in the end would be with the Government itself, and the Government must make up the shortage and ought to have any net surplus.

There has been much said recently about the breakdown of the railroads. Some here have stated that the breakdown was a misnomer, and there was no breakdown, but simply a failure of the railroads to do the transportation. I heard our Fuel Administrator state that "the mining of coal was purely a question of transportation," and whether or not the failure to deliver fuel last winter was on account of the breakdown of the railroads or their inability to transport coal, which amounts to the same thing, could have been prevented is even now more or less of a live question. At times it looked as if the failure to deliver coal was on account of the failure to mine it. At other times it looked as if the failure to deliver coal was the fault of the railroads. Whatever the fault, it seems to me now that we but confess our incompetency in not supplying ourselves with coal. Coal is the greatest and most abundant natural product on earth. Arkansas is a most promising State, rich in agriculture and mineral resources, and I have heard it stated of that State that there is coal enough in Arkansas to do the United States through all eternity. Be this as it may, I am sure there are mountains of coal in Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Kentucky, with an abundance of it in a number of other States, say nothing of Alaska. It looks ridiculous that there should be a coal famine in the United States and that people should be allowed to shiver and freeze for the lack of it or that it should be sold a bushel at a time. Truly it is not because we lack the coal in its natural state. The failure of our fuel supply is truly not because of the scarcity of coal. If the mining of coal is a question of transportation, as stated by Dr. Garfield, we should certainly increase our facilities for carrying coal. I do not believe that the railroads are so occupied with freight traffic that the roadbed itself could not accommodate a larger number of coal trains. I think one freight train could follow another every hour on any railroad in the United States to prevent freezing or starving. Perhaps in case of necessity one coal train could follow another within half an hour. And I do not believe that the solution would be more railroad beds or more railroads. Neither would more terminals be a solution. The terminals were loaded to their utmost capacity during the recent months when the weather was cold, and more terminals would but increase the facility for piling up more cars in their yards. If the railroads could not move the traffic in the terminals now possessed, how could the railroads move the traffic accumulated in additional terminals? An additional supply of engines would help solve the terminal congestion. The use of the street railways and subways in our cities would also help to solve it. An additional force to take care of the congested freight and coal upon arrival should be employed. Use the street railways to relieve the congestion in the cities. If need be, an additional track could circumvent the city at congested terminals and the coal and freight cars permitted to pass around instead of through the yards of our principal cities. Some are inclined to give car shortage as an excuse for fuel shortage, but there never was a time when there were more cars in existence than there are at the present time, and coal at the prevailing prices last winter could profitably have been drawn in any freight, box, gondola, as well as coal cars, and even gravel cars might have been profitably used. However that may be, whether because of the lack of railroads, locomotive power, car congestion, or what not, the people ought now to see that there will be no recurrence of the fuel situation of the past winter. If we need more engines, let us buy more or construct more. If we need more cars, let us now build more or buy more. If congested terminals cause the fuel shortage, let us employ more help to move the congestion, build circuitous spurs or tracks, use the street railways, and avoid the congestion. If it be a lack of miners, let us employ more miners. But whatever the cause, let every coal dealer, chamber of commerce, community association, commercial club, common council, city, village, and miner in the land undertake to prevent a recurrence of fuel shortage and begin now without waiting until the freezing weather comes and the congestion recurs. We have the roadbeds and can supply the facilities. We have the coal and can supply the miners. The city coal yards ought to prepare themselves now by stocking up for the coming winter. The Government in taking over the railroads should see that the people are supplied with coal and that congestion does not recur.

I am in favor of the prosecution of this war. I think the importance of winning it ought to be apparent and reflected by every citizen of the land. In the winning of the war we save our country. Our forefathers pledged their life, their fortune, and their sacred honor to establish the Republic, and ought we to do less in order to save and preserve it? Already Germany speaks of an indemnity of billions of dollars against us, and we know that in case we lose our Nation will be put into slavery as abject and dark as are the people of Belgium to-day. We must win, and never yield, until the last man goes down.

Mr. SHOUSE was recognized.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, is there any further time on this amendment, and if so, to which side does it belong?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] spoke 10 minutes, 5 of which was by unanimous consent. At the end of that 10 minutes the gentleman from Tennessee moved that all debate close in 20 minutes. That motion prevailed. The Chair then recognized the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] for five minutes in favor of the amendment, and then the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] in opposition to the amendment, and then the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], whom the Chair thought opposed to the amendment. Now, the gentleman from Kansas is recognized in favor of the amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. May I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that that is an unequal division of time. The gentleman from Kentucky had 10 minutes, and we will only be given 10 minutes on this side.

Mr. DECKER. But the 20 minutes agreed upon was after the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] spoke by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair took this view of it: That the Chair would divide the time equally after the motion to close debate.

Mr. CANNON. But the Chair has not done so. As I understand it, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] was for the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not so understand it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, the reporter's notes will show that the gentleman from Michigan three times said that he was in favor of the bill. He never once referred to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Michigan upon the supposition that he was opposed to the amendment. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SHOUSE] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am for leaving it to Congress.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan, as I understand it, states that he is for this amendment.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But he did not say so in his speech.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SHOUSE. Mr. Chairman, one of the great faults connected with the private operation of the railroad systems of the country since the beginning of this war, and one of the things that tended to bring about a degree of confusion recognized on all sides, which made necessary the taking over of the railroads by the Government, was the fact that the railroad systems were operated with a view to private gain to the stockholders of the systems rather than with a primary view to the benefit of the general public, which has paid for the cost of building the railroad systems of the country, either through land grants made by the National Government or through bonds voted by some State or some subdivision of a State. In order to secure the greatest degree of efficiency, in order to make the railroad systems answer the purpose necessary to the winning of this war, necessary to the transportation of the products of the country, the question of profit to private stockholders and to private individuals has to be eliminated in favor of what amounts to the greatest good to the greatest number, the public interest. The result is going to be that if the Director General of Railways and his assistants are hemmed in by a restriction making it necessary to turn back to the present owners of the railroads these various railroad systems within a specified time following the close of the war, then that degree of efficiency that ought to be gotten out of them in the matter of transportation can not be gotten out. In other words, it is going to be necessary to absolutely scramble the eggs, to mix up the railroad systems in a way that perhaps they never can be unmixed again, in a way that would be difficult to unmix them within a specified time.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHOUSE. Not now. For that reason it seems to me a matter of good business, a matter of good sense, a matter of good policy for us not to attempt at this time to fix any definite limitation on this Government control of railways. I am perfectly frank to say that personally I believe it is going to become necessary as a result of the conditions brought about by this war, and by the use of the railroad systems during the war, for the Government to take over the railroad systems; and I think you are going to be facing a very definite demand from the people of this country to know where you stand on that proposition before this war is over and perhaps before another congressional election is decided in this country. As I say, personally I think it is going to become necessary for the Government to retain control of the railroads, and I think it would not only greatly embarrass, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] suggested, the Government in taking over that control, to put this limitation upon this bill, but it would also serve to embarrass the administration of the railroads while the Government has control of them. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman made a statement in which he said that the reason the Government took over the railroads was because the railroad operators had operated their roads as private property and for private gain. I want to ask the gentleman if there was anything about profits in the act of 1916 which gives the President the power to take over these roads?

Mr. SHOUSE. I am not discussing the act of August, 1916; I am discussing this amendment.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The gentleman says that was the reason the Government took the roads over.

Mr. SHOUSE. I think that was the general reason that made necessary the taking of them over.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The act of 1916 gives the President the power to take over the railroads for war purposes.

Mr. SHOUSE. Exactly; but, as I say, I think the roads, if they had been one great coordinated system, might have been so operated as not to have made Government control necessary. But they were not one great coordinate system; there were dozens and dozens of different systems and each one being managed by its own management with the idea of earning the greatest possible income for its stockholders, which is natural.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHOUSE. I will.

Mr. BLACK. Is not the reason they were not coordinated due to the fact that Congress has passed laws itself that have absolutely prevented it?

Mr. SHOUSE. That is one reason.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, inasmuch as by inadvertence 25 minutes has been used by those in favor of this amendment and only 5 minutes against, that the time be extended for 5 minutes.

Mr. SIMS. To be given to those who oppose the amendment?

Mr. GILLETT. Of course.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the time——

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Make it 10 minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, it is suggested to me to make it 10 minutes, 5 for that side and 5 for this side, both against the amendment; 5 minutes to go to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and 5 to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the time may be extended for 10 minutes, 5 minutes to be used by the gentleman from Wisconsin and 5 by the gentleman from Kentucky. Is there objection?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama objects to the unanimous consent.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. BARKLEY) there were—ayes 40, noes 143.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, line 11, after the word "exceed" strike out "two" and insert "one" and strike out the letter "s" in the word "years."

Mr. SIMS. What does the gentleman say about time for debating the amendment? [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. ESCH. Let us have 20 minutes, 10 to a side. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. ESCH. Ten minutes to be in the control of the gentleman from Tennessee and 10 by myself.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. It is my understanding the debate on the section was limited to 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. No; on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that debate be limited to 20 minutes, 10 minutes to be controlled by himself and 10 minutes by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT.]

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, the House is to be congratulated upon the vote that has just been cast refusing to make itself guilty of obtaining property under false pretenses. [Applause.] That is just exactly what the proponents of the amendment just defeated demanded. This property was taken over by us under the war power, and the gentlemen have asked that when this war is over that we shall continue under the assumed war power to hold property after a reasonable time after the war is over. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] talks about the honesty of the people, and I agree with him; but the people have the same right to trust the honesty of this House, and I am very glad by so large a majority they propose that this House shall remain honest and keep its contract. Mr. Chairman, with reference to this limitation, let us see where we would have been if this amendment had not been defeated and where we may be, to a lesser degree, if this amendment of my colleague is not adopted. If there was no limitation in this bill, after this war was over, if prices go down, if wages go down, these gentlemen would have the Government continue to pay a billion dollars a year to the railroads when the fair compensation might be very much less than that sum. These gentlemen would continue to have Congress, to have the Government, hold the railroads when a majority of the Members of this House of Congress might vote to turn them back. It would require a two-thirds vote of each house of Congress if the President chose to exercise his veto.

The gentlemen were not willing to leave this question in the hands of Congress. Their real purpose was to leave the question in the hands of the President of the United States and not of the Congress.

Now, with reference to this one-year limitation or two-year limitation, a one-year limitation is ample time. We can, if necessity arises, extend, by joint resolution, the time, if a reasonable time has not elapsed; and I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that until we take over the railroads under the interstate commerce clause, so long as we hold them under the war power, we have no power upon earth to hold them beyond a reasonable time.

Mr. DECKER. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. LENROOT. No; I do not.

That will be not for the President or us to determine, but for the courts. And these gentlemen would be in this position, that if some of these more prosperous roads would make more money if they ran them themselves, they would say, "We have these roads now. They belong to us. You no longer have any control over them. We will take our revenues and our profits;" but there would be left in the hands of the Government all of the unprofitable roads of the country.

Mr. DECKER. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. LENROOT. I will not.

Mr. Chairman, the thing to do is to adopt the one-year limitation and trust Congress, which the gentlemen are so anxious to do—trust the Congress, if the necessity shall thereafter arise, to extend that limitation to another year. [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back two minutes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS].

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, I desire briefly to refer to the argument of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], who advocates a limitation of one year in this bill instead of two years. He supports his argument by the statement that if one year is not a sufficient length of time, Congress by a concurrent or joint resolution can extend the time, and that is the particular part of his argument to which I desire to call the attention of the House.

I do not know whether the President when he makes this contract with the railroads will write into the contract the limitation that is fixed in this bill or not; but, whether he does or not, there is not a court in the United States that will not write into that contract the language of section 14 of this bill. And there is not a railroad in the country that could not go into court at the expiration of one year, if you fix it at one year, and demand under its contract with the Government a return of its property. And no concurrent or joint resolution nor any act that Congress might pass could prevent the railroad from having its property returned to it.

He talks about the sanctity of contract. I stand for the sanctity of contract just as fully as he does. So I say we must live up to the contract we make with these railroads. And there is not one of them that would not have the right under the law or under the contract to demand a return of its property at the end of the time fixed by this bill, regardless of any action Congress might take. Congress can not impair the obligation of a contract by passing a resolution.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, a most singular harmony has arisen with reference to this bill. Every stockjobber, every owner of railway stocks and bonds, every man that is in favor of Government ownership, and every socialist is in favor of this bill. It is the first time I ever knew them to unite. The explanation for this most extraordinary harmony is not difficult, but is really simple. Those who believe in ultimate Government ownership think it will be brought about by this bill. The socialist regards it a step in the direction of socialism, which will, year by year, go further. But the stockjobber and the owner of stocks and bonds has the clearest right to be satisfied with it. Railway stocks and bonds have risen since the railroads were taken over by the Government with the understanding that Uncle Sam would pay for them at the rate provided in this bill. During the three years ending June 30, 1917, the average per cent of net income to capital stock outstanding for the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Ry. was over 22 per cent, the Pennsylvania Co. nearly 12 per cent, the New York Central nearly 13 per cent, the Chicago & North Western over 10 per cent, and that of some short lines above a hundred per cent up to one which made 647 per cent. Railroads controlling about 140,000 miles of track and handling about 75 per cent of the traffic are guaranteed by this bill an average net income of over 11 per cent.

Talk about camouflage! The greatest camouflage we have ever known in this country was created when the railroads carried on their propaganda to influence the people of this country and make them believe that they, the railroads, had not been doing well during the last three years. The last three years of the operation of the railroads have been the most profitable of any three years in succession that they have ever known and possibly any that they ever will know.

Do you gentlemen realize that this bill guarantees and makes as good as a Government bond the revenue which these railroads have been receiving during this period of the highest point of their prosperity? No wonder the railroad magnates and the railroad owners are in favor of this bill, when it makes absolutely secure these unreasonable profits. Think of the situation! Our Government is asking its citizens to purchase liberty bonds drawing 4 or 4½ per cent, and the railroads, in a time like this, ought to have been content with a similar rate. Instead, amendments restricting the profit to 7 per cent have been voted down, the committee which reported the bill insisting that it should not be changed, and some of its members even denying the accuracy of the figures which I have given, which are all taken from the reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

It should be remembered also that this is on watered stock and all. There are roads like the Kansas City Southern, which is capitalized at $99,000,000 when the valuation commission found that the reproduction cost was only $50,000,000. The American people will some day wake up and see the trick that has been played upon them by the provisions of this bill, which allow the railways more than just compensation.

Government ownership is, in one sense, to be on trial. The wholesale looting of railroads in the cases which I have referred to and others have brought many people to believe in Government ownership, but Government ownership will not get a fair trial under the present plan. Apparently dividends are to be raised, surpluses increased, wages made higher, and everybody cared for except the public. What the cost of such a proceeding will be no one can even guess.

Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for this bill not because I approve of these provisions but for other reasons. It has become absolutely necessary that it should pass to provide some method of controlling and managing the railroads, since they were taken over by the Government. Otherwise much could be done without authority of law. This has already happened and probably could not be avoided. I shall also vote for the bill especially because I am unwilling to deny to the President or the administration any power that, if properly exercised, would assist in winning the war, and I shall not insist that my opinion be adopted as to how this great object should be carried out. I have heretofore, and do now, and will in the future, lay aside my convictions rather than to fail to give the most wholehearted support to every measure that can possibly tend to bring victory nearer. Time is the essence of success in war. Victory is never won by hesitation. Unity of control and concentration of power is necessary for the highest efficiency. If there is any delay or any lack of necessary power it shall not be laid to any act of mine, and in common with every patriotic citizen I renew to the administration the pledge that we made at the beginning of the war—to devote all the resources of the Nation to its prosecution.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, the question of time is not usually of the essence of things. It is so here. We want to name a time that is reasonable, a reasonable time, and show that we really mean to give the railroads back, and we want to do it because, first, we want the railroad men to understand that they must do their very best for the Government, and keep the railroads running as only railroad men know how to do, and not simply fall down and say: "We do not care anything about it, because we are not going to have them back soon."

We want the Director General to remember that in his management of the railroads, wherever possible, he shall conduct them and keep them in such condition as that they can be handed back. We do not want to see the condition that we have seen wherever the Government has had control, that the people were not considered. [Applause.]

I yield back the rest of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, there is ground for a difference of opinion as to what the American people may desire Congress to do touching the railroads and their operation at the close of the war, but there is no legitimate ground for, and there should be no difference of opinion in regard to, the proposition of ending autocratic war control over the railroads as soon as possible with the coming of peace.

I can not understand how any good citizen, whatever may be his opinion of what should be our policy in respect to the railroads eventually—I can not understand how any citizen who values the good faith of the Congress and of the Nation, or who is desirous of preventing a condition of political railroading, can desire to have the autocratic control of the railroads, apparently necessary in time of war, projected far into times of peace.

The sooner this autocratic control ends after peace comes the better, and surely the Congress of the United States can, within a year after the signing of the peace treaty, decide what shall be our permanent policy for the future. I have not been fully convinced that the taking over of all the railroads was wise or necessary as a war policy, but that has been done, and in this bill we are making provision for that war-time control.

Manifestly, this form of control concentrated in the hands of the Director General is not such a control as anyone would desire as a permanent policy in peace, therefore the importance of fixing a reasonably early date after peace comes, prior to which the future and permanent peace status of the roads shall be determined. [Applause and cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has six minutes.

Mr. SIMS. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT], a member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, let us for a moment constitute ourselves a jury in this case. What are the facts? After we have the facts, what shall our verdict be in regard to this time limitation?

Now, the primary fact in this case is expressed in the first words of the act, "That the President having in time of war taken over the roads," and therefore we have as an admitted fact that he takes them over in time of war. He does not take them over by reason of the commerce clause of the Constitution, nor does he attempt to take them over by the clause of the Constitution referring to the establishment and maintenance of post offices and post roads. Having taken them over under the war power, necessarily as a matter of law it follows conclusively that the right of the President would instantly cease when the war was at an end, except for one provision, and that is read into the law itself in all cases of this character. What is that? That a reasonable time must be given after the time fixed at which the power ceases.

Now, the power ceases at the expiration of the war. A reasonable time must be given. This act provides what we regard as a reasonable time. It says the reasonable time shall be after the proclamation of peace and the affirmance thereof by the President and the Senate of the United States, not to exceed two years thereafter. Therefore, gentlemen, having all the facts in hand, the only question before this committee is this: What is a reasonable time? Is it one year or is it two years? It is a matter of minutiæ and not of policy. Now, personally, I favor two years, and I will tell you why. In the first place, what might be a reasonable time for one road would be an entirely unreasonable time for another. I grant you that some roads might be given back to their corporate owners in six months, others in one year after the proclamation of peace, and still others possibly not in two years. But when the time is fixed as a reasonable time, not exceeding two years, you give the opportunity for all roads, large or small, to be adjusted.

Now, the other reason——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DEWALT. I am very sorry I can not proceed, but I realize that the debate is limited.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin will be disagreed to and voted down. I feel that the Members of this House will lay aside prejudice, will lay aside what effect they think a vote one way or the other on this amendment may have on the question of Government ownership as a principle. There is absolutely no principle involved between one year and two years. It is simply a question of policy. Now, under this bill the railroads of the country may necessarily become indebted to the Government in a very large amount of money. They may owe the Government a billion dollars or more at the end of the war. We do not know how long the war is going to last or what the exigency may be, and it only requires such reasonable time after the war, not exceeding two years; that is the provision of the House bill. And remember that the President may release these roads at any time. If the war does not last long and the railroads do not become indebted to the Government to amount to anything, why, they may be turned back to their owners in a very short while. But with the possibility of the war lasting a year or two years or three years, and with the vast amount of railroad securities held by the Government itself, and with the vast amount held by the financial institutions of the country, why put an arbitrary limit of 12 calendar months and take the chance of extending the time by resolution afterwards. We do not know what shape we shall be in, but there is an economic psychological question to take care of, and that is to prevent the depression of the railroad securities held by financial institutions, trust companies, national banks; and with the guaranteed return which will permit the payment of interest on these securities as long as the Government holds the railroads, there will not be any depression in the market for those securities. But with the absolute certainty that within 12 months, regardless of conditions, regardless of credit, regardless of the amount of railroad property in the shape of bonds that may be owned by the Government of the United States, they are all to be dumped on the market at one time, without any power on earth in the Government through the operations of the Treasury to protect them. If gentlemen on either side are more anxious to determine a mere academic question as to the effect of the longer or shorter time they may have upon the question of Government ownership than they are to protect the people of the country in their public interests, why, then, let them go ahead and vote against the good of their country in time of war; the responsibility will be theirs, and God be merciful to them. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. To strike out that portion of the amendment which provides for one year, and insert in lieu thereof "18 months." This will make the amendment conform to the provisions of the Senate bill, which has already passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the amendment by Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia: Strike out the words "one year" and insert in lieu thereof the words "18 months."

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, on a division (demanded by Mr. ALMON) there were—ayes 35, noes 122.

Accordingly, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out the words "two years" and insert the words "ninety-nine years."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment by way of substitute which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute by Mr. LONDON for the amendment offered by Mr. ESCH: On page 15, line 11, strike out the word "two" and insert the word "ninety-nine."

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LONDON) there were—ayes 4, noes 102.

Accordingly the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ESCH) there were 115 ayes and 97 noes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were 143 ayes and 111 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, after section 14, insert the following as a new section:
"That the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department is hereby authorized and directed, in accordance with the powers conferred by paragraph 36, of rule 11, and of the House of Representatives to examine and audit from time to time the accounts and expenditures of all moneys appropriated by section 6 of this act; and said committee is authorized to employ certified public accountants, competent stenographers"——

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, the reading of the amendment so far has disclosed that it is subject to a point of order, and I make it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that the amendment is not in order. Does the gentleman from New York desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Chairman, it is my contention that the language of this amendment covers the subject matter in the bill and does not violate any of the rules of the House. That being the case, I think it is a perfectly proper amendment to the bill under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. A sufficient part of the amendment has been read, it seems to the Chair, to enable it to be seen quite clearly that the proposed amendment is not germane to any section of the bill, and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, after line 20, after the word "transportation" insert "and the President may relinquish all railroads under Federal control at any time he shall deem such action needful and desirable."

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I shall not take time to argue this matter. I only want to state it. We have properly limited the right to surrender particular roads without the consent of the roads to a time before July 1 next. After the United States have taken over a particular road they ought not to discriminate against it by surrendering it except with that road's consent. But, on the other hand, the Senate committee saw that if the control of all railroads, in the opinion of the President, became undesirable, he ought to have the right to surrender all the roads at any time, and therefore they inserted these words that I have just offered, that if the President at any time deems such action desirable he shall have the right to surrender all the roads and end Federal control.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is any opposition to the amendment on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. That this act is expressly declared to be emergency legislation enacted to meet conditions growing out of war; and nothing herein is to be construed as expressing or prejudicing the future policy of the Federal Government concerning the ownership, control, or regulation of carriers of the method or basis of the capitalization thereof.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all on page 16, except the word "war," line 1.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, beginning with the word "and" after the word "war," line 1, strike out all down to and including the word "thereof," line 4.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, if anyone wishes to speak against the amendment I want to be heard.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, would a motion to strike out the entire section take precedence of the motion of the gentleman from Michigan?

The CHAIRMAN. It would not; the motion to strike out a part would take precedence.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest to the gentleman that he would make his amendment better if he would move to strike out the whole paragraph; it seems to be nothing but language.

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, Mr. Chairman, I will move to strike out the whole paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. FORDNEY: Strike out all of section 15.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, if the committee will bear with me for a moment, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE], a gentleman for whom I have the highest regard as a gentleman, and because of his ability, states that to strike out the entire section would be a very serious mistake, but that my first motion is all right; that is, to leave the first portion of the section in stating that the act is expressly declared to be emergency legislation enacted to meet conditions growing out of the war. If permitted, I shall again amend my motion to strike out by striking out only that portion of the section after the word "war," as I first offered the amendment, and changing the semicolon to a period.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan by unanimous consent withdraws his motion to strike out the paragraph and offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FORDNEY: Page 16, line 1, after the word "war," strike out the semicolon, insert a period, and strike out the remainder of the language in the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. DECKER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan desire to be heard upon his amendment? [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not, unless some gentleman desires to be heard against it; then I would like the privilege of using the balance of my five minutes.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, is that according to the rule? Has the gentleman not to present his views first?

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, it is late, and I shall not consume any more time, but will ask for a vote.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, I have no hopes of changing your views, but I shall discharge a duty that I owe to this House, and that is to see to it that if you vote to strike this out you do it with your eyes open. It simply means this: The gentleman from Wisconsin and some others on that side have spoken with great vehemence about doing something that will be in favor of the railroads. Yet by striking out this section, what do you do? You give the men who own the railroads, who have been clamoring for the last 10 years for an increase of rates, who have been distributing through this country a propaganda to weaken the power and the influence of the Interstate Commerce Commission, a chance to come in after the war is over and say that the Congress by legislative action has set a precedent as to what the rates should be and what is legitimate compensation for the use of the railroads. Oh, I know you say that it is not binding, but at the same time you have got to admit that it is persuasive evidence on behalf of the private owners of the railroads. Why are you afraid to put in the bill the plain language in these words——

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the amendment.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman may not see the point, but I think some other men who are on the committee on the other side will. I shall explain it to him a little plainer.

Mr. FORDNEY. All right, go ahead.

Mr. DECKER. The gentleman is speaking to the point, and I shall make it a little clearer so that the distinguished gentleman will understand. One of the clauses which you seek to strike out says this shall not be construed as fixing a basis of future capitalization. What does that mean? Let me say that the railroad brotherhoods had one of the ablest attorneys before our committee that I ever had the pleasure of listening to, and the burden of his whole argument was this—and I do not say that I agree with him. He claimed that no railroad had a right to receive a cent more than reasonable interest on the money judiciously invested in the railroad. You may not agree with that, but the railroad brotherhoods fought for that proposition in this bill as the basis of compensation, but they waived their objection after we put this clause in saying that this bill should not be taken as a basis for any future fixing of rates or fixing of the compensation of railroads in case the people of this country in their power should rise up and take over the railroads permanently.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say just a word. I shall detain you only 30 seconds. While this amendment is not necessary and does not change the bill, I shall vote for it. This is an emergency war measure. If I thought it was not, I would vote against the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. FORDNEY) there were—ayes 80, noes 131.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, in order to perfect the short-line amendment and in reference to the exclusion of electric urban and interurban lines, I ask unanimous consent that we may return to section 1 that that amendment may be offered.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I have seen the amendment, and I think it is perfectly harmless, and I have no objection.

Mr. ESCH. So as to bring the matter into conference.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to return to section 1 to offer an amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, insert at the end of section 1 the following: "That every railroad not owned or controlled or operated by another carrier company, and which has heretofore competed for traffic with a railroad or railroads of which the President has taken possession, use, and control, which connects with said railroad and is engaged as a common carrier in general transportation, shall be held and considered as within the Federal control as so defined and necessary for the prosecution of the war and shall be entitled to all the benefits of the provisions of this act: Provided, however, That nothing in this paragraph shall be construed as excluding any street or interurban electric railway which has as its principal source of operating revenue urban, suburban, or local interurban passenger traffic or sale of power, heat, or light, or both.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I ask to return to section 10 by unanimous consent. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] offered an amendment to this section, which is printed on page 2695 of the RECORD, in which he says:

No person employed in connection with the operation of railroads or systems of transportation under Federal control, except those persons referred to in the preceding section—

Which is section 8—

shall be deemed to be an officer or employee under the United States—

And so forth.

And then his amendment went on to say that this should apply for the purposes of the workmen's compensation act or for the purpose of the war excess-profits tax, but it left out the civil-service act, which is the most important of all, and perhaps others, and therefore I proposed to insert, after the words "United States" the following:

otherwise than is herein specially provided, nor for the purpose of the laws as to civil service, nor—

And then it goes on in the language of his amendment, specifying the other two acts.

Mr. SIMS. What is the request, unanimous consent to return?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Yes, sir. I ask unanimous consent to return for that purpose only.

Mr. SIMS. It is too late now, and I will have to object. It is immaterial to this bill.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. All right, I have stated my point.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 7, after the word "thereof," insert the following: "any securities so purchased shall be held by the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall, on the direction of the President, represent the United States in all matters in connection therewith in the same manner as a private holder thereof."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands permission was given at the time to return to this section. The question is upon the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, there are two very short amendments that the chairman has agreed to accept, but through inadvertence they were not offered at the time, and I ask unanimous consent that they be offered now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that two amendments may be offered at this time. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. Let them be reported. I reserve the right to object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LENROOT: Page 6, line 3, strike out beginning with the comma, through line 5, and insert a period and the following:

"The acceptance of any benefit under this section shall constitute an acceptance by the carrier of all of the provisions of this act, and shall obligate the carrier to pay to the United States, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from a date or dates fixed in proceedings under section 3, the amount by which the sums received under this section exceed the sum found due in such proceedings."

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, we have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to returning for consideration of the amendment. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LENROOT: Page 6, line 18, after the period, insert the following:

"In case of disobedience to a subpœna the board may invoke the aid of any district court of the United States in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence, and such court within the jurisdiction of which such inquiry is carried on may, in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpœna issued to any person, corporation, partnership, or association, issue an order requiring appearance before the board or the production of documentary evidence if so ordered, or the giving of evidence touching the matter in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to returning to this section for the purpose of considering the amendment offered? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9685) to provide for the operration of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. SIMS. I demand a separate vote on what is called the Sweet amendment, introduced by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET].

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment?

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, if it is proper at this time, I want to say that there is such a slight attendance here on such an important matter that I believe this vote ought to go over until to-morrow morning, when we have a quorum here. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment than the Sweet amendment?

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire a separate vote on the amendment for retaining control of the railroads for one year.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON] demands a separate vote on the amendment about retaining control of the railroads for a year—the Esch amendment.

The vote will first be taken on the Sweet amendment.

The question was taken.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Have the other amendments been voted on?

The SPEAKER. No. The Chair will put the question on the other amendments. The question is on agreeing to the other amendments besides the Sweet and Esch amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments other than the Sweet and Esch amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Sweet amendment.

The question was again taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. SIMS and Mr. HEFLIN demanded the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll. All those in favor of the Sweet amendment will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 165, nays 210, answered "present" 2, not voting 51, as follows:

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN] voted?

The SPEAKER. He has not.

Mr. FERRIS. I ask unanimous consent to make a short statement in reference to Mr. MCKEOWN. I want the RECORD to show that he is absent on account of a severe accident to his wife who was run over by a taxicab. If he were here, he would have voted with the committee on all railroad propositions and for the bill.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill S. 3752, a bill of similar tenor, be taken from the Speaker's table and be considered in place of the House bill, and that all after the enacting clause in the Senate bill be stricken out and the House bill as amended substituted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 3752, strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the House bill as amended. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 3752) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. DENISON. On that, Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 339, nays 6, answered "present" 1, not voting 81, as follows:

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. TALBOTT. If he were present, he would vote "yea," as did I. I shall therefore allow my vote of "yea" to stand.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I would inquire if the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. DENT, is recorded?

The SPEAKER. He is not recorded.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, Mrs. Dent phoned me this morning that Mr. DENT was sick and unable to be at the Capitol to-day, and I want therefore to explain his reason for not voting on this roll call.

Mr. PAIGE. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. DALLINGER, is ill at his home and requests me to state that if he were present he would favor this bill and would vote "yea."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish also to announce that if the gentlemen from New York, Messrs. SNELL, DUNN, and HAMILTON, were present, they would vote "yea."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. SIMS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that 1,000 copies of the Senate bill with House amendments be printed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would ask if these are for distribution, because I have some requests for copies of this bill.

Mr. SIMS. Yes; they will go to the document room.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House insist on its amendments to the Senate bill and ask for a conference.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I would have to object.

Mr. SIMS. Very well, I withdraw the request.

Mr. SWIFT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that an amendment which I offered to the bill, which was not fully read, be printed in full in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SWIFT: Page 15, section 14, insert the following as a new section:

That the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department is hereby authorized and directed, in accordance with the powers conferred by paragraph 36 of Rule XI of the House of Representatives, to examine and audit from time to time the accounts and expenditures of all monies appropriated by section 6 of this act; and said committee is authorized to employ certified public accountants, competent stenographers, and clerks, to examine persons and papers, and administer oaths, and to convene during the sessions of the House and to report from time to time the result of its examinations with any recommendations to the House; and that out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $250,000 is hereby appropriated for the use of said committee for the purposes herein specified.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 10358) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report (No. 346), was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered printed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for an indefinite leave of absence for Judge CRISP, of Georgia, on account of the critical illness of his sister.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. SMITH of Idaho, for one day, to attend the funeral of his nephew.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that following the consideration of the pension bill, which follows this bill, that we may consider the daylight-saving bill.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 8 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, March 1, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 1, 1918.

Rev. William F. McDowell, of the city of Washington, bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, do Thou control our minds and hold our hearts in Thy hand. Direct our deliberations for the highest good of the country and the greatest good of mankind; and grant Thy blessing to the Government of the United States and to our allies in this great struggle. In the name of the Lord we ask it. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House insists upon its amendment to the bill (S. 3752) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes, requests a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SIMS, Mr. DOREMUS, and Mr. ESCH managers at the conference on the part of the House.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. McNARY (for Mr. CHAMBERLAIN) presented a petition of the Marion Lawrence Bible Class, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of Salem, Oreg., praying for the closing of all breweries and saloons for the period of the war, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of Local Branch, Massachusetts State Federation of Woman's Clubs, of Wollaston, Mass., praying for the repeal of the present postage rate on second-class mail matter, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. KNOX presented memorials of sundry citizens of Altoona, Pa., remonstrating against the placing of railroad tracks directly opposite the Lucy Webb Hayes Training School and the Sibley Memorial Hospital, in the city of Washington, D. C., which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce, of Philadelphia, Pa., praying that an appropriation be made providing for the deepening of the Delaware River from Philadelphia to the Atlantic Ocean, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the congregation of the Chartiers Presbyterian Church, of Canonsburg, Pa., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of Local Lodge, No. 735, International Association of Machinists, of Beaver Falls; of Local Lodge, No. 798, International Association of Machinists, of Butler; and of sundry citizens of Philadelphia, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. THOMPSON presented a petition of the Woman's Kansas Day Club, of Topeka, Kans., praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Club of Topeka, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation to protect the United States flag from misuse or desecration, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PNEUMATIC-TUBE MAIL SERVICE (S. DOC. NO. 191).

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to present at this time the report of the joint commission appointed by the two Houses to investigate the pneumatic-tube situation. It is a very short report.

I desire to state for the information of the Senate that there will be quite an amount of additional matter to accompany the report. This additional matter consists of reports of the engineers and their findings and conclusions, reports of accountants who have carefully gone through the books of the pneumatic-tube service companies, and other publications that appear to be essential so that the Senate may have full and complete information.

I make this report to-day, Mr. President, because under the resolution authorizing the appointment of the commission they were required to report not later than to-day.

I wish to state that one member of the commission on the part of the House will file a minority report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the report will be printed.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. UNDERWOOD:

A bill (S. 3994) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize condemnation proceedings of lands for military purposes," approved July 2, 1917, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SHAFROTH:

A bill (S. 3995) to amend section 224 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to certificates of discharge; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GALLINGER:

A bill (S. 3996) granting an increase of pension to George L. Jaquith (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BANKHEAD:

A bill (S. 3997) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the Postmaster General to adjust certain claims of postmasters for loss by burglary, fire, or other unavoidable casualty," approved January 21, 1914; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. THOMPSON:

A bill (S. 3998) granting an increase of pension to William H. Young (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 3999) granting an increase of pension to Alonzo L. Whitcomb (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SMITH of Maryland:

A bill (S. 4000) to authorize corporations organized in the District of Columbia to change their names; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. LEWIS:

A bill (S. 4001) to amend an act entitled "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings; to authorize the enlargement, extension, remodeling, or improvement of certain public buildings; to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings; to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings; and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1913; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

A bill (S. 4002) granting a pension to William L. Martin; and

A bill (S. 4003) granting an increase of pension to Sarah J. Lackady; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. REED:

A bill (S. 4004) granting an increase of pension to Dwight Simpson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 134) to reimburse soldiers and officers for uniforms and equipment lost on board the Tuscania February 5, 1918, and in other like cases; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENT TO LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment providing for the appointment of a messenger for the minority, at $1,440 per annum, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

RAILROAD CONTROL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives insisting upon its amendment to the bill (S. 3752) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment, agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, Mr. POMERENE, and Mr. TOWNSEND conferees on the part of the Senate.

WAR FINANCE CORPORATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business is closed, and the calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, Senate bill 3714.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3714) to provide further for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I am not one of those who think that war ends legislative responsibility. I believe that when the House of Representatives and the Senate have given their best thought to legislation it is more certain to be wise and helpful than when bills are passed simply because they are the work of those connected with administrative branches of the Government. Entertaining these firmly fixed views, and endeavoring at all times to live up to them, I wish to express an earnest appreciation of the splendid work done by the Secretary of the Treasury and those who aided him in the preparation of this bill. I believe that it will prove a great contribution to our war finance.

The war and the sale of Government bonds have necessarily disarranged and will continue to disarrange financial conditions. This corporation will be a national agency which to a great extent may overcome much of the disorganized conditions produced by the war and by the sale of Government bonds.

It is proposed through this corporation to aid banks that are extending credits to corporations and firms that are necessary and contributory to the prosecution of the war, evidenced by the notes of such corporations and firms. It is also proposed to aid these banks by discounting paper secured by the obligations of the corporations and firms necessary and contributory to the prosecution of the war. Thus, Mr. President, we strengthen the banks that help the industries engaged in doing the work essential to the conduct of the war. The bank which helps financially such an industry understands that this corporation we are now creating will be in a position to discount its paper taken from these war industries and discount its paper secured by the obligations of these war industries. Safeguards are thrown around the loans. They are put in a shape to make them secure, but it helps the banks of the country to feel more secure when they are helping to fight the war by advances to war industries.

Next, as to savings banks, we understand fully that depositors in savings banks are likely from time to time to withdraw their money to buy Government bonds. Of course we are gratified to have them do so. The savings banks usually invest the money received from their depositors in long-time nonliquid securities. To make the savings banks stronger, this corporation can loan directly to them where it becomes necessary. Thus these institutions so essential to our national prosperity will be placed in position to meet unusual withdrawals.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. PAGE. Is the Senator prepared to express an opinion at this time as to whether the issuance of 4½ per cent bonds would prompt a large withdrawal from the savings banks?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not. I hope we shall not be compelled to issue 4½ per cent bonds.

Mr. PAGE. I put a hypothetical question. If we should do so, what is the Senator's opinion?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I doubt whether it would cause as large withdrawals of savings bank deposits as might seem probable. Next year the depositors may need their money, six months from now they may expect to use their money, and there are a great many reasons why the savings bank certificate is more desirable for savings bank depositors than long-time securities.

Mr. PAGE. I agree with the Senator fully in regard to the smaller depositors in savings banks, but we have a few depositors who deposit quite large sums and it becomes, of course, with them a pure, cold matter of profit and loss. I wondered if the issue of 4½ per cent bonds might not in a small measure at least embarrass the banks unless we have some provision to safeguard it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This legislation is a safeguard against that embarrassment. It is intended to give this corporation with large resources an opportunity to help steady any abnormal conditions that may develop financially as the war goes on and as bond issues are made.

The third class, as I shall handle it, of loans to be made by this corporation are directly to the public utility companies, and the corporations conducting an established and going business, whose operations are necessary and contributory to the prosecution of the war, and which the board finds of exceptional importance in the public interest. That is quite a wide discretion. I favor accepting the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] and adding, on page 10, before the word "security," in line 3, the word "adequate." I would do this lest the language on the prior page might indicate a different purpose, lest the language on the prior page, which deals with the public interest, might cause the board of directors to feel that they were expected to regard what they deemed the public interest too largely and the value of the securities too lightly. I do not think they would do so, but I believe the word "adequate" should be placed before the word "security," on the third line of page 10.

Thus briefly, Mr. President, I have called attention to the way in which this corporation is expected to help carry the general responsibility that falls upon the Nation financially. It has a further authority to buy Government bonds. Of course, this is not meant as a "pegging" proposition. It is not meant that this corporation will undertake to purchase all Government bonds that fall below par, but I desire to mention in this connection that few Government bonds, our last liberty bonds, have sold below par. The evidence before the Finance Committee disclosed the fact that $50,000,000 of these bonds are about all that have changed hands out of the great volume sold by the Government. Purchasers had supplied themselves in part from patriotic reasons and in part as a permanent investment under the original sale. An active purchaser in the market with $50,000,000 would have put the bonds practically up to par, for only about $50,000,000 of bonds came into the market. I think it is valuable for us to remember this fact, because it shows that there is really no weakness but strength in the Government bonds.

Now, Mr. President, this corporation is to be given a capital of $500,000,000 out of the Treasury as it is called for by the board of directors, and then it has the privilege of issuing from time to time $4,000,000,000 of bonds. These bonds are required to be of not less than one year's time and not over five years.

It has been asked by the Senator from New Hampshire why should this corporation issue bonds, why not simply issue bonds by the Government and increase its capital out of the National Treasury? There are a number of reasons why it is believed that the bond issue by this corporation to increase its available capital is more desirable than for it to draw upon the Treasury.

These bonds will meet a demand that the Government bonds do not meet. They are shorter-time bonds. They may run for only one year. They can not run over five years. Their time of payment is intended to take them out of the field of the bonds sold by the Government and to fit them into a place where capital will be seeking an investment to which the Government issues do not apply.

If it were suggested that we might have the short-time Government bonds just as well, the reply is that if we made the Government bonds so short we would have to sell again bonds to meet them on maturity, while this corporation issuing its bonds invests the money in assets which it will turn into cash to meet its bonds. Each time it issues a bond and loans money it takes a security maturing before the bond matures, and its maturing securities all the time are expected to enable it to meet its bond issues.

It occupies in that respect a position entirely different from the Treasury. When the National Government meets its bonds it must either have money from taxation or money from other bond sales with which to meet them. In present conditions for the Government to sell a short-time bond would simply be a short-time bond to be met by the sale of another short-time bond. So it is believed that this corporation, with bonds as sound as Government bonds, will, through the short-time bonds, be able to meet a demand that the Government bond would not meet.

Criticism has been made upon these bonds because they have a certain status at the Federal reserve bank.

The suggestion has been made that this bond issue would tend toward an undue expansion of the currency. Mr. President, this bill does not change a single restriction that is placed around the Federal reserve banks in the issue of Federal reserve notes. It only provides that the bonds of this corporation may be used at the Federal reserve banks just as Government bonds are used; it stops there. If a loan is to be obtained at a Federal reserve bank, it still can only be obtained by one of the member banks upon the paper of that member bank, and that paper must mature in not less than 90 days.

The bonds of this corporation can not be used at the Federal reserve banks to change that limitation upon the character of paper that alone must at a Federal reserve bank be made the basis of the issue of Federal reserve notes; these bonds may be given by the member bank as security for its 90-day paper—that is all. It can now give any Government bond as security. The member bank alone can borrow from the Federal reserve banks. The member bank can give one of these bonds as security for its 90-day paper instead of giving a Government bond—that is all—but it must be the paper of a member bank, and that paper must be due in 90 days, upon which a loan is made or Federal reserve notes issued.

Going one step further, the privilege of using these bonds on the part of member banks as security for their notes does not in any way change the provision in the Federal reserve act that requires a Federal reserve bank to maintain 40 per cent of gold against all the Federal reserve notes issued from it. The Federal reserve bank is also required to maintain 35 per cent of gold or of lawful money against its deposits. This bill does not change any of those requirements.

Now, let us see what is the present status of the Federal reserve banks. On February 21 they had available of gold $1,772,000,000; they had legal-tender notes, silver, and so forth, to the amount of $60,000,000; making a total of $1,832,000,000. Of that, $1,773,000,000 were deposits. Against their deposits they must permanently maintain, out of this $1,832,000,000, 35 per cent. This amounts to six hundred and twenty million seven hundred and odd-thousand dollars. They have already issued Federal reserve notes to the amount of $1,314,000,000. Against that issue they must maintain a 40 per cent reserve. When we deduct from their present gold and legal-tender notes and silver the reserve they must maintain against their deposits and against their Federal reserve notes, they have a balance of $682,000,000 against which they can issue Federal reserve notes. Instead of their being authorized, as a result of the passage of this bill, to increase the Federal reserve notes to any great extent, to-day on all classes of securities, on the notes of the Federal reserve banks, on Government bonds, and on these bonds, they could not issue, if they maintained their present deposits, over $1,700,000,000. So I think we need have no disturbance of mind about these bonds affecting in any way our Federal reserve banks.

These are short-time bonds. The large quantity of Government bonds have not gone to any considerable amount into the Federal reserve banks. The Federal Reserve Board is authorized to control the issue of Federal reserve notes, and it is authorized to fix a discriminatory interest rate, applicable to Federal reserve notes issued and secured by these bonds in excess of the amount that it fixes on other transactions in the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. HOLLIS. Unless these bonds are used as the basis for the issue of Federal reserve currency, how will they help to get additional funds for quick asset purposes?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not exactly understand the Senator's question.

Mr. HOLLIS. The Senator from Georgia says that these bonds will not do any harm, because they will not be used; he argued that because the liberty bonds have not been used to any great extent for the purpose of getting additional currency these bonds will not be so used. Unless these bonds are used for that purpose, what good are they going to do for the purpose of getting quick cash capital?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Well, I do not understand exactly what the Senator means by "quick cash capital." These bonds can be sold to individuals just as liberty bonds were sold or can be sold to banks and to investors generally. They can procure "quick cash capital" for this corporation without going to the Federal reserve banks at all.

What I was undertaking to show was that there was no cause for alarm upon the theory that these bonds would be rushed into the Federal reserve banks. There is no rush upon the Federal reserve banks for the issue of Federal reserve notes. These short-time bonds are expected to meet a demand for investment entirely different from the Government bonds. They are made for a length of time shorter than are the Government bonds. They can run for from one to five years; they may be only one year in duration. It is therefore believed that they can and will be used for investment purposes by private citizens as well as by corporations and by estates, where the desire is not to make a long-time investment, and that they will fill a demand in such cases for investment which the Government bond does not meet. These bonds are given this privilege with reference to the Federal reserve banks just as Government bonds are in order that there might be full confidence in their stability, their value as an investment be appreciated by the public, and that banks can use them with the Federal reserve banks as security for their 90-day loans.

The other important provision in the bill is the creation of a board to supervise bond issues. There is already a committee doing that work, and so far there has been nothing but support given by the public to its work. I believe it consists of two members of the Federal Reserve Board and three outsiders, who hold no office, but who cooperate with the other members. I am not familiar with the business of the three outsiders, but I recall that when their names were mentioned before the Finance Committee those who knew them all seemed to think their selection was ideal.

The new plan of organization is to put this responsibility on the Federal Reserve Board. When it was suggested to the Secretary of the Treasury that the Federal Reserve Board should act, he promptly agreed that it was entirely satisfactory to him. The public knows the Federal Reserve Board. That is certainly one organization that has won universal confidence; and it was believed that those who might have bonds to dispose of, already knowing the work of the Federal Reserve Board, would feel greater confidence if the responsibility was practically put in their hands, and the Secretary of the Treasury, when it was suggested, said it certainly was perfectly agreeable to him. The three members of the Federal Reserve Board and two outsiders, selected, I believe, by the Federal Reserve Board, are to constitute that committee.

Of course, it is the exercise of a very great responsibility, but we all realize that it is essential. I believe there was no dissent in the Finance Committee of the Senate from the view that such action was essential. The question was, How could we perfect an organization that would inspire universal confidence, and that we could lean upon with the assurance that the work of the organization charged with this duty would be acceptable? And the solution proposed was unanimously reached.

This bill, I trust, will substantially help to steady the finances of the country during the war; but our people should finance the war by the economies they practice. It is the patriotic duty of each individual to reduce his expenses to the extreme limit. It requires no high degree of intelligence to see that we are fighting for something nearer to us than world-wide democracy or European boundaries. The Balkan States are in the hands of Germany, and the Prussian war lords are extending their domination over Russia toward the Pacific Ocean. The German people have been taught to hope, to struggle, and to fight for world-wide conquest. They must be stopped or the barbarous treatment accorded to the Belgians may be repeated on our own soil, among our own people, upon our own wives and children. If Germany should win the war, the least that would be exacted of the United States would be a huge war indemnity. We should prefer death to submission. We lacked vision in 1914, or we then would have made preparation for war. Let us not longer be blind; let us at once prepare with every resource for this war; let every man understand that the sacrifices made of comforts, of property, and of life are made because they are necessary to save his own country and his own family.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, in September last I introduced a bill to amend the Federal reserve act, which authorized the Federal Reserve Board to accept such bonds or notes of any railroad, industrial, public-utility corporation, or municipality that the Federal Reserve Board might approve as security for temporary loans on the same basis as commercial paper is taken to-day.

At that time I felt that it would not be long before the country would be face to face with a situation which would warrant some such legislation. The Federal Reserve Board and the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate, to which my bill was referred, were of the opinion that the enactment of that bill would bring about an inflation in our financial system which might prove disastrous.

I did not agree with their conclusion, and so, when the measure now under consideration was introduced, with the backing of the Federal Reserve Board and of the Secretary of the Treasury, it seemed to me that, to some degree, it was an indorsement of my attitude of last summer.

This measure is a very radical departure from our financial system and one that all of us must approach with the feeling that, except for the extraordinary conditions facing the Nation, no such measure should be considered.

During the last session of Congress upward of $18,000,000,000 were appropriated for the conduct of the war, and a revenue bill was enacted which, it is hoped, will bring to the Treasury for this fiscal year upward of $3,000,000,000. Liberty bonds have been sold aggregating $6,297,000,000.

Treasury notes and other means have been resorted to to secure the necessary money to conduct the Government's business and to finance the war. All of these bond issues and tax levies, as well as other activities of the Government, have so completely changed our normal financial arrangements that some such measure as the one now under consideration becomes absolutely necessary.

It is needless to say that I have conferred with the leading financiers of the city of New York, who have been as much concerned as anyone in America to see that the Nation's finances are kept in such condition as to avoid disaster.

This legislation deals with the very fundamentals of business. It is a proposition which warrants the most careful consideration of the Congress, Mr. President. It has caused wide discussion among those interested in our financial institutions. There is a great divergence of opinion among men of affairs in this country as to whether this bill meets all the requirements and whether there is any possible danger of undue inflation. We must all appreciate the fact that inflation, to some extent, is unavoidable.

I shall not discuss the general terms of this measure, Mr. President. They have already been completely covered by others. I wish to say, however, that the bill, in the main, meets with my approval.

Permit me to call the Senate's attention to certain amendments that I have given notice of my intention to propose.

These amendments secure to the savings banks, building and loan associations, and insurance companies of the country the opportunity to protect their immense interests in case necessity arises. Certainly there are no concerns in this country whose interests should be more carefully safeguarded than these very institutions.

Section 6, paragraph C, provides for advances to savings banks and should include life insurance companies. Calls for money are not so readily made in life insurance companies as in savings banks, but who may tell what may happen if the war continues for any length of time? All modern life insurance policies give the policyholder the right to borrow nearly the whole amount held by the company for his policy, and the loans made by life insurance companies in New York State alone amounted to $693,000,000 in 1916. With a prolonged war these loans might assume dimensions dangerous to the interests of these institutions, which had assets on December 31, 1916, to the total of $5,144,000,000, one-half of which was invested in stocks and bonds and one-third in bonds and mortgages on real estate.

Besides, there is no provision in life insurance policies which enables the companies to require previous notice of desire to borrow.

It is my opinion, Mr. President, that life insurance companies should be in one class with savings banks, so far as assistance by the Government is concerned.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CALDER. I do.

Mr. KELLOGG. Do I understand the Senator from New York to say that life insurance companies and fire insurance companies should be taken care of in this bill?

Mr. CALDER. I may say to the Senator that I propose introducing amendments which will permit companies organized under the insurance laws of the respective States to come to this corporation for relief. I am convinced that the very inclusion of a provision of that kind will do much to protect the insurance companies; and if it does not, if they need to come, I believe they should have the right.

Mr. KELLOGG. But insurance companies do not receive deposits. They are loaners of money rather than institutions receiving deposits.

Mr. CALDER. That is true.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does the Senator think that all the business in the United States should be done by the Federal Government?

Mr. CALDER. I will say to the Senator that in these unusual days, when the laws that have been enacted and the operation of the war have so completely disturbed every sort of business, the time may come when insurance companies will need relief, and this bill should be so fixed as to afford them relief.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. May I ask the Senator to point out the necessity for such an amendment? Does he know at the present time of any insurance companies, either life or fire, that need relief of this character or that in any way can contribute, by reason of the fact that they are supported by the Government, to any war emergency?

Mr. CALDER. I can readily understand how a condition of affairs might arise that would warrant a life insurance company in appealing to this corporation for relief. I have indicated in my remarks that on the 1st of January, 1917, the life insurance companies in the State of New York had loaned to their policyholders, under the privileges accorded policyholders by their policies, a sum equal to nearly $700,000,000. Suppose the necessities of the war require that policyholders should borrow large sums of money upon their policies. I should like to have this law in such shape that the directors of this corporation could loan to life insurance companies on their securities sufficient money to take care of their immediate needs. The fact that a provision of this character is incorporated in the bill would in itself probably prevent calling upon the corporation for relief.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

Mr. CALDER. Now, if the Senator wishes me to answer regarding fire insurance companies, I will say this:

A few years ago we had an unusual conflagration in Baltimore, and after that another at San Francisco. As a result many of the fire insurance companies of this country were very near bankruptcy because of the immense drain upon their resources. My amendment, while not specifically including any particular sort of insurance companies, would permit their coming to the corporation for relief if they were in dire need. I simply afford by these amendments the opportunity to do so.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Has the Senator noticed that under section 6, paragraph (d), if a fire insurance company or a life insurance company should be in dire need it could apply directly to the board under that paragraph? I call attention to the paragraph, and then will ask the Senator if that would not be satisfactory. I read paragraph (d):

To make advances directly (1) to any corporation owning or controlling (directly or through stock ownership) any railroad or other public utility—

and (2) to any firm, corporation, or association conducting an established and going business whose operations are necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war.

If a life insurance company or a fire insurance company is considered as a corporation whose operations are necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, under that provision it could make a direct appeal to the corporation for assistance, and no doubt if it were in peril it would receive the needed relief. Has the Senator thought of that part of this paragraph in connection with the insurance companies, both fire and life?

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I have examined the provision referred to by the Senator from Utah, and it is possible that the language might be construed as covering the very thought that I have in mind. I was constrained to offer these amendments at the request of many gentlemen interested in these great insurance corporations, who feel that it is possible that they may be forced to apply for help, and are anxious that this law should be so fixed that they might be afforded the opportunity if necessary.

Mr. SMOOT. I think if the Senator will give that provision of the bill careful consideration he will find that it is so broad in its scope that it can take in almost any kind of corporation or association that is now doing business, and that if they are in dire trouble they can be taken care of by this corporation, and that they will not be forced even to go to the bank and allow the bank to do it for them. In other words, they would be in a privileged class and not forced to put up the security that the banks would have to put up, or even the savings banks, if they went to the corporation for assistance.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, perhaps the Senator is correct, and it may be that the language in the provision he has just quoted covers the ground. I was prompted to introduce these amendments because I was anxious that our building and loan companies, which have in the neighborhood of $1,000,000,000 loaned on bonded mortgages throughout the country, that our insurance companies, that our mortgage insurance companies, which alone in New York City have upward of $700,000,000 worth of guaranteed mortgages, might be afforded protection in these days when their money market is drained.

I would also call attention to the fact that the market for property and real property securities has been affected by war conditions, and the Government activities have practically drained this market of all money and left it entirely without resources for payment or the refunding of its obligations, and it is not able to bear its part in assisting the Government to finance the war.

Previous to the entrance of the United States into the war it was not only possible but a matter of routine to pay or refund maturing obligations of this nature. Do you know that the large volume of money hitherto available for these transactions has been diverted entirely and completely to other channels, chiefly to investments in liberty bonds? This to the almost complete paralysis of this great market.

Estimates of the volume of existing mortgages upon real property in the city of New York alone vary between four and five billion dollars. Of this amount, approximately 25 per cent mature and become due and payable every year. Hitherto this has been taken care of and has been performed with little friction, for the exchange currents have always been provided with sufficient current funds.

The war conditions, however, have completely changed the situation. A large number of investors in loans upon real property securities are demanding payment of maturing obligations. This is a peculiarly menacing feature of present conditions in its bearing upon holders of mortgaged property for there is open to them no way of relief from foreclosure and the possible loss of their equities.

There is a peril for the savings banks of the country, also, in the prospect of the offering of a large Government loan issue at a rate of interest higher than 4 per cent. Few savings banks can pay or are paying over 4 per cent interest now. It is feared that their depositors might find in the 4½ per cent liberty bond attractions superior to that offered by the savings banks. If there should be any general demand for the withdrawal of deposits from the savings banks they would under present conditions be unable to pay.

It is interesting to note, Mr. President, that the assets of the savings banks of New York State are to-day approximately $2,300,000,000. At least one-half of this sum is invested in bonds and mortgages on real estate and 75 per cent of the remaining half is invested in stocks and bonds.

It is also well to take into consideration the calamity that might befall our fire insurance companies if we should have a repetition of the conflagration of several years ago in Baltimore, unless the fire insurance companies were also included within the operations of the corporation authorized by this act.

So, Mr. President, I have offered these several amendments to permit relief to be obtained by corporations organized under banking or insurance laws of any State.

For the successful prosecution of the war it will be absolutely necessary to put at ease the working people, who are the mainstay of the Nation, as well as the savings banks and life insurance companies. If they know that they can get their savings from these institutions any time they need them this assurance would encourage them to deposit their earnings in the savings banks and to carry insurance on their lives. The savings banks and the life insurance companies would in turn invest these savings in securities to provide the Government with funds for the prosecution of the war.

I trust, Mr. President, that the Senators will examine these amendments and that when the vote is taken they will give them their support.

I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD, Mr. President, a statement of the assets of the life insurance companies and savings banks doing business in the State of New York as of December 31, 1916.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the printing is authorized.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Assets of life insurance companies and savings banks doing business in the State of New York, 1916.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, if I understand the purport of this bill, its object is to guarantee at this time the credits of the railroads who are in dire need of funds to enlarge their equipment and to carry on their business. I understand there is nearly a billion dollars of maturities this year that will be required to finance the railroads. I feel that the support of the Government should end there. I do not agree with that portion of the bill which guarantees to individual corporations or individuals these credits.

If we are going as a Government to guarantee and indorse the credit of private business, there will be no end to it. The laws of the various States regulate the life insurance companies incorporated in them, as well as the fire insurance companies. They provide certain reserves for contingencies such as conflagrations and such as depreciation in securities. If the capital of a fire insurance company becomes too greatly impaired, it is insolvent, and it must wind up and reinsure its risks; and I do not believe it is necessary at this time for the Federal Government to guarantee the credit of fire insurance companies. I think if the securities which they hold in the railroad corporations of this country are guaranteed by the Government, that is all that is necessary. I think the fire insurance companies can take care of themselves without this assistance.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I should like very much to bring myself into a frame of mind where I could vote for this bill in its entirety. I can not do so, much as I should like to see some of the purposes of the bill carried out.

The bill, as it is now, is a bill to extend relief to indigent millionaires, more or less worthy or unworthy. I do not see any relief here for the average man who is transacting business. He could not get within a thousand miles of help or the Treasury Department.

There are a great many investments of savings banks, fire insurance companies, life insurance companies, and trust companies that handle a variety of trust funds for estates, for guardianships, many of them running for a term of years by the provisions of the testamentary trust. The older a country is the more that class of investment appears. Many of those have their funds invested in municipal bond and in drainage bonds. When I use the term "municipal bonds" I mean it in the general sense that any branch or subdivision of a State government created under any of the laws of a State are comprised in that term. These bonds, especially the serial issues, fall due from time to time. They are drawn by lot or fall due in serial numbers. They are paid off out of the proceeds, sometimes of sinking funds, sometimes from a special tax levied under the provisions of the State constitution requiring a direct annual tax to be levied during the lifetime of the issue, which in some States is for a limited term of years—10 years, 20 years, 30 years. This direct annual levy is for the purpose of creating a sinking fund to discharge the entire indebtedness upon its maturity or for the discharge of a given number of bonds at fixed intervals during the period preceding the maturity of the last or all of them. Not only these sinking funds are invested, but in the instances where the principal is paid off it is necessary, in all the cases I have alluded to of the trust funds waiting investment, to reinvestment those same funds in some adequate security.

Municipal bonds running into very large sums in this country have been an appropriate method of investment. State statutes have been framed authorizing such investment. Many orders have been entered by various courts of the country having a general chancery or equity jurisdiction authorizing investment in certain classes of bonds as securities, very largely of the municipal securities. This measure prohibits in its necessary terms the issue of municipal securities. There is no escape from the conclusion. It is true a municipality may not be expressly hampered by an act of Congress in the issue of its securities; but whenever the securities are issued, whether an original or a refunding issue, it is indispensable for the municipality to find a market. It can not find a market ordinarily by itself peddling the bonds out, as the phrase goes, among the permanent investors. It goes to a bond house or a trust company, some place where the persons are skilled in finding a market for that form of security. Necessarily, then, under the provisions of this bill, a bond house is subject to a penalty the instant it takes a municipal security and attempts to sell it on the market, unless licensed. The municipality can sell to the agent, to the bond house, or to the trust company or to a national bank, but if the bond house undertakes to sell to a third person it is subject to penalties under this bill. Therefore it in effect prohibits the issuing and marketing of municipal securities.

Then comes the utilities, the gas, the electric light, the street car, the interurban, the several forms of activity in which considerable sums are invested. That property has two sources of value. The one is the tangible or physical property and the other is the franchise or permit under which it operates. Both of them are a property value. That is taken into account upon the issuing of bonds and in marketing them to prospective investors. Of these not one issue of any kind can be marketed without a license. First, there is a capital issues committee, under whose permit only are these issues made. If they deny it, the issue must stop. Therefore it stops at the source of issue of all these securities as well as later on stopping the marketing of municipal securities. The power to license implies the power to refuse.

I believe that the powers concentrated in this bill are of that character that never ought to be put in the hands of any living person. There is no one man who lives, or series of men by which he can surround himself, who possesses that universal omniscience that will make him wiser than all the persons interested in the municipal utility securities or municipal bonds of the country where those are sold. There is no man who can be created, no single person, who is wiser than everybody. Heretofore all these securities have been marketed upon the general demand for them when offered to those who are seeking investment. It seems to me that it is a very dangerous thing to interfere with this vital process of our investment affairs.

The Secretary of the Treasury in the hearings before the committee admits and attempts to justify the fact that no municipal security of any kind can be issued without his consent. Practically they can issue them, but they can not get beyond into the general market, because no one can handle them unless the municipality sells direct and undertakes the almost impossible task of finding a general market. The bond house or the trust company acts as the distributor. It finds the small investor, it takes the bonds in an entirety, pays for them, holds them, and finds the public, so that when these securities are digested it is through these agencies that are now prohibited by penalty from selling any of the bonds.

Another thing I think it well enough to keep in mind: I do not know whether we are keeping track of the pace we are driving in the delegation of power or not. I doubt very much whether the general public has kept that in mind. The Secretary of the Treasury has large powers. To begin with, he controls through his influence all the national banks of the country. He necessarily has great influence with the Comptroller of the Currency. In addition to that he has a controlling voice on the Federal Reserve Board. It is by recent legislation put in his power to control two hundred and fifty-odd thousand miles of steam railways in the country, together with all of their securities both past, present, and prospective, some $18,000,000,000 worth of securities. In addition to that he proposes by this bill to put his hand upon the pulse beat of every municipality in the country, so that not one dollar in effect can be issued or marketed without his consent. In addition to that, he has all of the vast powers that go with and through the Federal Reserve Board, the contraction and expansion of the currency.

There is now in this country $3,000,000,000 worth of free gold. That is our gold supply, in round figures, all the net result of our trade balance of some years past of a favorable character, settled by gold shipments to this country. By looking at the daily United States Treasury report of February 25, 1918, I find assets that would be a part of the money in circulation, gold coin a given sum, gold bullion a given sum, both of which added make $2,400,000,000, in round figures, of gold assets. Against that are liabilities of outstanding gold certificates of $1,255,000,000, a gold settlement fund under the Federal Reserve Board of $914,000,000, and the $152,000,000 and over of gold reserve that has been held to preserve the value of the $346,000,000 of greenbacks that are outstanding, together with available gold in the general fund of $78,000,000 and over, making the total liability to balance the total gold assets.

Under this bill there is a $500,000,000 capital stock that is to be subscribed by the United States. So the Government is the only shareholder in the war finance corporation. The only way to pay for these shares is to draw cash from the Treasury. It requires, then, a half billion dollars to begin with to finance this concern and make it a going enterprise.

These resources are to be loaned for the purpose of promoting various distressed millionaires in the country. I do not know of a single utility in all the United States that finally, when you track it down to earth, is not owned by one or two or five men. I do not care what may be the size of the city. After all, these gentlemen ordinarily take care of themselves. None of them is likely to land in a bankruptcy court.

This bill, in the first instance, will extend relief to this needy portion of the American people. I am not particularly interested in relieving the clamorous poor of that kind in my part of the country. All of them can obtain relief on the market. They have been able to do so in the past, and I decline to lend myself to extracting $500,000,000 out of the taxpayers to relieve these gentlemen.

I can call the list of public utilities in one, the third largest State in the Union, from the city of Chicago clear down to East St. Louis. When I call the list of those public utilities, I call the list of enterprises owned by men who do not need relief under this bill. They will survive any and all operations if the Government itself survives. It will be necessary to wreck everything in the way of public or private business before these enterprises will go to the wall.

After this part has been attended to there can be eight times the capital stock of the company with the war finance corporation issued in bonds. Eight times the capital stock makes $4,000,000,000 of bonds to be put upon the market in various ways. I presume along comes one of these distressed utilities. It may have half a million dollars of bonds maturing. If they were to go out on the market, ordinarily, a large part of their bonds paying 5 per cent now, they would pay the same rate when renewed or refunded. The gas company in Chicago, the People's Gas Light & Coke Co., the electric light, the power, all of those enterprises ordinarily are now paying 5 per cent on their securities. The Government I do not anticipate would loan them at 5 per cent. It probably would loan at some more favorable figure.

After this is done these securties, if the new issue is required or an old issue is to be refunded, are to be called in, taken by the War Finance Corporation, and in lieu of them to the former holders of these securties there is to be issued these bonds of the War Finance Corporation, which, in effect, as I understand, are to be Government bonds. It imposes a liability upon the Government. Reading the hearings on this bill I come to the conclusion, guided largely by the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, that they become in effect obligations of the Government. So in substance the Government takes the utility bond issues, or whatever the security is, of whatever enterprise we are considering needful for relief, puts them in the hands of the War Finance Corporation as collateral security, and issues in lieu of what in effect I will denominate "Government bonds." It may do so in all to the extent of $4,000,000,000.

These bonds when issued are available in the hands of the former owners of the security for borrowing purposes. They may go to a member bank of any Federal reserve district, put up those bonds as collateral, give their notes, and the member bank may then carry those notes to the Federal reserve bank and rediscount them. A provision of the bill provides that these notes then become eligible as a basis for the issue of Federal reserve notes. In other words, they thereby broaden the base for the issue of Federal reserve notes.

I have no objection to taking care in a legitimate way of all maturing credits, but in effect it goes further. It furnishes a basis of $4,000,000,000 of expansion of the money in circulation.

It is said there must be a 40 per cent gold reserve. That is true. All of the gold certificates are now being called in. I challenge any Member of the Senate to go down and cash a check in Washington any place or with the financial clerk of the Senate and get a gold certificate. You may travel up and down the Atlantic coast on a several days' journey and it will be an accident if you find a gold certificate at any time or place in your travels. The gold certificates, in fact, are being impounded by the Federal reserve banks of the country. They are calling them in, and wherever they get one in a Federal reserve bank there it stays.

With $3,000,000,000 of free gold in the United States and with $2,400,000,000 reported on February 25, 1918, in the Treasury statement, we have on a 40 per cent basis in the Treasury statement a means of figuring what the possible expansion of Federal reserve notes may be. With a 40 per cent basis on every $1,000,000,000 worth of Federal reserve notes you have got to have $400,000 of gold or gold certificates. That is the reserve. On the entire amount that is in the Treasury statement, taking it in round figures, there could be an expansion of over $5,000,000,000 of Federal reserve notes with the 40 per cent gold reserve back of it. If by any possibility the Government called in or acquired more of the free gold of the United States up to the $3,000,000,000, we could issue more than the figure named out of the $3,000,000,000 of free gold, and the Government, if it were possible to get it all, could issue $7,500,000 of additional Federal reserve notes.

Examine your pocketbooks, all of you, the change you carry and your bills, and you will find that now you have nothing but Federal reserve notes to transact business on around Washington and up and down the coast. I think the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] gave the figures this morning. We already have—I quote from memory—about one billion seven hundred and some million dollars of Federal reserve notes. If we add to that a potential $5,000,000,000 additional of Federal reserve notes, or going to the full limit of $7,500,000,000, we have reached over $9,000,000,000 of Federal reserve notes alone, and still it is said that we are not traveling on a gallop along on the road to inflation. We are not merely traveling there, we have reached the neighborhood now.

When the amount of securities is increased still further, when more bond issues come along and there are more liberty loans, credit will be still further expanded. To keep pace with the expansion of credit there must be an expansion of the money in circulation. I have some of the figures as to circulation that are given here by the Treasury reports. In 1914 there was per head in the United States $34.35 of money in circulation; there was in January, 1916, two years later, $38.48; in 1917, there was $43 per head in circulation; and on the 1st of January, 1918, there was $48.76 per head in circulation; in other words, we are traveling very rapidly in increasing the money in circulation in this country. That increase in circulation is one of the reasons for the prices that are disturbing a great many gentlemen at this time.

I am not willing to put into the hands of one person these powers. In all candor, without being desirous of starting a political discussion in this Chamber, with these vast powers concentrated in the hands of one official, I should like to inquire what gentleman would feel safe if William J. Bryan were now the Secretary of the Treasury with the powers already vested together with those contemplated in this bill? It is not so much a question of whether Mr. McAdoo may wisely exercise these powers; it is what somebody else with all the financial idiosyncracies of Mr. Bryan might do if afterwards called upon to fill that office. The danger or the wisdom of extending these powers is to be measured by the possible abuse of the powers some time in the future by some one who will not be guided by the wise limitations of the present incumbent of that office. I can not, therefore, Mr. President, bring myself to support this bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KING. I hold no brief for Mr. Bryan, but if the Senator will remember, Mr. Bryan was never an advocate of fiat money, he never was an advocate of greenbackism. He merely accepted the view that was crystallized into law on the foundation of this Republic that there should be gold and silver as the money of ultimate reredemption. The Senator will remember that the first financial bill that was proposed by Hamilton was a recognition of gold and silver as the money of ultimate redemption upon a parity. That was well established and was recognized in all the world. Mr. Bryan, possessing, as the Senator says, idiosyncracies, did not have the idiosyncracy of advocating greenbackism or fiat money, but merely insisted that there should be a free coinage of silver upon a certain established basis, and he proposed that the financial policy of the founders of the Republic should be adopted as the policy of the Republic.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I will accept part of the Senator's statement. At the time to which he refers in our earlier history, when gold and silver were both money of ultimate redemption, the ratio was 15½ to 1. Mr. Bryan went one-half better, and made it 16 to 1, which became at once the consecrated, God-ordained ratio between the two metals. At the time when the ratio was 15½ to 1 silver in reality was worth more than gold. Silver had not been mined extensively; it was not available in the world's supply at that time so as to make that ratio desirable, and, as a matter of fact, silver went out of circulation during the time when the ratio was unfavorable to silver; it became merchandise rather than money. Just as soon, however, as the ratio was disturbed by its large production and silver became the cheaper money on the market, this idiosyncracy to which I referred began to manifest itself in a very active way.

I am not particularly wedded to gold, but gold is the most stable of the metals. We are on a gold standard basis to-day. Gold is not only stable, but its price is world-wide; it is not subject to fluctuation in the ordinary market at any place in civilized countries. So when it is said that the distinguished commoner was not in favor of fiat money it is true, but I judge of a man's ultimate destination by his symptoms, and by the direction in which his toes are pointed rather than the length of the step he is taking.

At the time, Mr. President, that the distinguished Commoner from Nebraska was cleaving the air all over this country with his peculiar doctrine on monetary reform, with the ratio of the metals separated, I could go down to El Paso, Tex., and buy for 49 cents a silver peso with more grains of pure silver in it than a silver dollar in this country. I carried a bag full of it around until I nearly wore it out. There was free coinage of silver across the Rio Grande River, and there had been for years. Mexico had a dollar which was worth more than ours in point of mere bullion quantity if it had been worth par, but you could pound up the bullion in a Mexican silver dollar and sell it on the market for only 49 cents. Therein was the peculiar attractiveness of that kind of a dollar to Mr. Bryan.

It was the degree of the disease at that particular time that was attractive, and it is the kind of disease that I make the subject of criticism, because ultimately it leads a man to the fiat money destination. With that kind of a man at the head of the Treasury I submit that this kind of a bill if enacted into law would be a public menace. It would put in his hands the instrumentalities to wreck the credit of this country and to bring us to some unheard-of and unthinkable standard of monetary reform.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. KING. I do not want to break into the very interesting and very instructive speech of the Senator from Illinois; and, if he will permit me to say so, his speeches are always interesting and always instructive; but I want to differ from him in one statement which he has just made. Probably I am wrong and the superior knowledge of the Senator will justify the statement which he made, namely, that gold is more stable in value than silver has been or than is any other article or any other commodity. I do not know that I quote the Senator accurately, but the idea that the Senator ought to convey was that gold ought to be the measure or standard of value, because it is more fixed in its price or value when measured by other commodities. I think the Senator is in error in that respect.

So long as silver was a money among the people and had not been demonetized by Governments, I think the record and evidence relative to money, especially if you will read Mr. Jacob and other great writers upon the subject, will tend to show that silver has been more stable in value, measured by a given number of commodities, than has gold.

Gold has fluctuated greatly in value. The discovery of gold in California, the discovery of gold in the Rand Region, in South Africa, the discovery of gold in Australia and in the Klondike, when the golden stream was poured out into the arteries of trade, necessarily caused a tremendous fluctuation in values. Gold then, measured by a given number of articles, did not have the same fixed price as silver would have had under similar circumstances if it had been a money of ultimate redemption the same as gold.

The point I am trying to make is that gold, I think, in the history of the world has shown more violent fluctuations in value, measured by given standards, by the value of a given number of commodities, than has silver when silver has not been demonetized. Silver in this country did not show the disparity in value to which the Senator from Illinois referred until we demonetized it in 1871 and 1873. I think that if we had not demonetized silver there would not have been that disparity between the price of gold and the price of silver.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thank the Senator for his complimentary reference, which I certainly value. I can return the compliment many times over, for I always listen to the Senator from Utah with pleasure. I shall not be drawn aside, however, by the very great respect I have for him and his associates on the majority side of the Chamber from the historic fact that this agitation never begins until the appearance of some cheaper metal that can be used as a legal tender. Then immediately arises the difficulty, and the consequent clamor for a change. It is one of the historic truths that when there is discovered some cheaper form of metal that may be made legal tender advocates of the kind to which I inadvertently referred a while ago are always active in the zeal with which they carry their views forward. The conclusion to which I inevitably arrive is that all of the distinguished advocates of such movements are searching for some easier way to pay debts. Of course, legal-tender decisions in this country have made it possible to make almost anything legal tender that carries a Government promise on its face, and such forms of legal tender will discharge the obligation of a debt. Having paid the debt, no Government can fix its purchasing power.

The Treasury reports, however, refer entirely to gold; our standard on which we measure values is gold; all of our Liberty bond issues are gold obligations; the larger part of the securities maturing at various times—nearly $800,000,000 of them falling due within the current year—are gold obligations and call for the payment of the indebtedness evidenced by the securities in gold coin of the present standard of weight and fineness, or some equivalent expression. So, for the purpose of discussing this bill, we must consider it on the gold-standard basis, and I am asking, in the event these vast powers are centered in the hands of a Secretary of the Treasury at some time in the future who is in favor of disturbing the existing standard, what the necessary effect of it would be on the credit of the country? That is one of the reasons why I hesitate, even in time of war, to concentrate in the hands of a single official, however wise now, these vast powers.

There are a number of sections in this bill upon which I would greatly like to comment, Mr. President, but I shall content myself with the few general remarks that I have submitted on the objectionable features of this bill as they appear to me. I can not support it although I wish to say, for the information of the Senators, that nearly every public-utility man from my section of the country has wired me to support this bill. They have stated that they will not be able to take up their maturing obligations unless the Government helps them. Well, for my part, before voting for such a measure as this I would rather vote for a moratorium and stay the collection of debts in proper cases while the war is in progress. I think that would be attended with less risk than the vesting of such tremendous powers in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury.

REGISTRATION FOR MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent to take up for consideration two very important joint resolutions which have been reported by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, who is ill. These measures are very much needed so that the Judge Advocate General may carry on the draft.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I understand from the Senator from New Jersey that the joint resolutions to which he refers are very urgent, and that he thinks they can be disposed of in 15 minutes and that there will be practically no debate and no objection to them. I am perfectly willing to have the unfinished business laid aside so that the Senator may call up these joint resolutions, with the understanding that if debate develops lasting more than 15 or 20 minutes the joint resolutions are to be withdrawn.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I shall be very glad to withdraw my request for the consideration of the joint resolutions if action upon them takes longer than that time. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the Senate first consider Senate joint resolution No. 124.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate has heard the request of the Senator from New Jersey and also the explanation of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think it is necessary that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, and I ask unanimous consent, therefore, that that course be taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was about to make that suggestion. A request for unanimous consent being made that the pending bill be temporarily laid aside, and the Chair hearing no objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from New Jersey is recognized.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business No. 244, being Senate joint resolution No. 123.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request of the Senator from New Jersey having been heard, and the Chair hearing no objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, instead of considering first Senate joint reslution No. 123, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 124) providing for the registration for military service of all male persons citizens of the United States or residing in the United States who have, since the 5th day of June, 1917, and on or before the day set for the registration by proclamation by the President, attained the age of 21 years, in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe under the terms of the act approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States."

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. NEW. I do not understand what disposition, if any, was made of Senate joint resolution No. 124. I understood the Senator from New Jersey to call up that joint resolution, and now I understand that he calls up another. Is Senate joint resolution No. 124 before the Senate?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I corrected the request, and asked to substitute Senate joint resolution No. 124 for Senate joint resolution No. 123 as the one to be first considered. Senate joint resolution No. 124 is now before the Senate, as I understand.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask that the joint resolution be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair begs pardon of the Senator from Utah. The Chair has not responded to the parliamentary inquiry of the Senator from Indiana. As the Chair has not information on the subject of the inquiry, if the information imparted by the Senator from New Jersey is satisfactory, then the Chair will take that as an answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. NEW. The Senator from Indiana understands that Senate joint resolution 124 is now before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands; it is. Now, in response to the request of the Senator from Utah, the joint resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in section 2, page 3, line 2, after the word "act," to insert:

Provided, That students who are preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools at the time of the approval of this act shall be exempt from the selective draft prescribed in the act of May 18, 1917; and that students entering such theological or divinity schools after the approval of this act and during the continuance of the war, and who would be subject to any future registration as provided for in this act, may upon the recommendation or request of the president or dean of such school be exempt from the selective draft by order of the President.

So as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That all male persons, citizens of the United States or residing in the United States, who have, since the 5th day of June, 1917, and on or before the day set for the registration by proclamation by the President, attained the age of 21 years, shall be subject to registration in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the President, and that upon proclamation by the President, stating the time and place of such registration, it shall be the duty of all such persons, except such persons as in said proclamation may be exempted from registration, to present themselves for and submit to registration under the provisions of the act approved May 18, 1917, and they shall be registered in the same manner and subject to the same requirements and liabilities as those previously registered under the terms of said act.

SEC. 2. That after the day set under section 1 hereof for the registration by proclamation by the President at such intervals as the President may from time to time prescribe, the President may require that all male persons, citizens of the United States or residing in the United States, who have attained the age of 21 years since the last preceding date of registration, and on or before the next day set for the registration by proclamation by the President, except such persons as in the proclamation by the President stating the time and place of such registration may be exempted from registration, shall be registered in the same manner and subject to the same requirements and liabilities as those previously registered under the terms of said act: Provided, That students who are preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools at the time of the approval of this act shall be exempt from the selective draft prescribed in the act of May 18, 1917; and that students entering such theological or divinity schools after the approval of this act and during the continuance of the war, and who would be subject to any future registration as provided for in this act, may upon the recommendation or request of the president or dean of such school be exempt from the selective draft by order of the President.

SEC. 3. That all such persons when registered shall be liable to military service and to draft under the terms of said act approved May 18, 1917, under such regulations as the President may prescribe not inconsistent with the terms of said act.

SEC. 4. That all such persons shall be subject to the terms and provisions and liabilities of said act approved May 18, 1917, in all respects as if they had been registered under the terms of said act, and every such person shall be deemed to have notice of the requirements of said act and of this joint resolution upon the publication of any such proclamation by the President.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, was that the last proviso just read?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It was.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is the committee amendment?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes. It provides that students preparing for the ministry shall be exempted.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Why should they be exempted in this hour of trial of the Government? Is that in the original act?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes; it is in the original act, as I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NEW. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. 5. That in addition to the persons subject to registration and selective draft under the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, all male persons between the ages of 19 and 30, both inclusive, shall be subject to registration and draft in accordance with the provisions of said act: Provided, That all registered male persons who have attained the age of 19 years shall be subject to military training in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the President, but shall not be called for active service until they have attained the age of 21 years.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I understand that the chairman of the Finance Committee [Mr. SIMMONS] would object to laying aside the finance bill for so long a time as would probably be necessary for the proper consideration of this amendment. There are some things that I should like to say concerning it myself, which might require some little time. I think there are other Senators on the floor who would like to be heard also. If time can be given for its proper consideration now, I am prepared to go ahead with it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand from the Senator from Indiana that he desires to know whether more time than 15 minutes is to be conceded by the chairman of the Finance Committee, or does the Senator from Indiana merely give notice that he wishes to take up this matter without regard to the regular time of discussion?

Mr. NEW. The Senator from North Carolina is absent from the Chamber at this moment. I suggest that he be informed of the situation.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say, Mr. President, that the Senator from North Carolina agreed to let us take up these matters with the understanding that only a limited time would be devoted to them. I do not know how much time the Senator from Indiana will require, but he certainly can go on until the Senator from North Carolina comes in.

Mr. SIMMONS entered the Chamber.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was wondering if the Senator from Indiana would not allow us to pass the joint resolution without insisting on that amendment at this time?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. NEW. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. My agreement with the chairman of the Finance Committee is that if the discussion of these joint resolutions takes more than 15 minutes, I shall move that they go over. In view of the fact that this very important amendment has been offered to this joint resolution, and it will lead to extended debate, unless the Senator from Indiana will agree to withdraw the amendment I shall have to move that the joint resolution lie over; but I hope he will consent to withdraw it, for this reason:

At this time the Judge Advocate General is preparing to call the next draft, and this joint resolution provides that the men who have become 21 years of age since June 5 last shall be included in the new registration for the draft, in order that it may be more properly apportioned. It is a very important joint resolution, and the introduction of the amendment by the Senator from Indiana may lead to several days' delay. I do hope that he will consent to withdraw the amendment in order that we may pass the joint resolution at this time.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. NEW. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. I agree with the substance of the amendment; but I think it would be better if the Senator would consent to withdraw it at this time and get the other part of the joint resolution in motion, in consideration of what the Senator from New Jersey has said. It is imperative to have the original portion of the joint resolution acted upon at once.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I hesitate to withdraw this amendment. I concede the importance of the joint resolution. As a member of the Military Affairs Committee, I think I realize just what it provides for. I agree with the Senator from New Jersey that the withdrawal of my amendment might save several days' time, but I think that the adoption of the amendment I have offered may ultimately save several months' time. I think that had the provisions of this amendment been law two or three years ago the war in which the United States is now engaged would have been ended in favor of the United States and its allies some time ago.

I feel, Mr. President, that I can not accede to the request to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield the floor, or does he yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. NEW. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Under those circumstances I ask that the joint resolution lie over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire to have the joint resolution returned to the calendar?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move that it be returned to the calendar; yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, such will be the course.

CALLING INTO MILITARY SERVICE CERTAIN PERSONS LIABLE THERETO.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask the Senate take up for consideration Senate joint resolution No. 123.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 123) providing for the calling into immediate military service of certain classes of persons registered and liable for military service under the terms of the act of Congress approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be stated.

The amendments were, on page 2, line 2, after the word "for," to insert "military"; on the same line, after the word "act," to strike out "approved May 18, 1917"; in line 7, after the word "classes," to strike out "from any State" and insert "except those exempt from draft under the provisions of said act"; in line 9, after the word "classes," to strike out the comma and insert "in the various subdivisions of the States, Territories, and the District of Columbia designated by the President under the terms of said act"; in line 12, after the word "immediate," to insert "military" and in the same line, after the word "service," to insert "persons classed as," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That if under any regulations heretofore or hereafter prescribed by the President persons registered and liable for military service under the terms of the act of Congress approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," are placed in classes for the purpose of determining their relative liability for military service, no provision of said act shall prevent the President from calling for immediate military service under regulations heretofore or hereafter prescribed by the President all or part of the persons in any class or classes, except those exempt from draft under the provisions of said act, in proportion to the total number of persons placed in such class or classes, in the various subdivisions of the States, Territories and the District of Columbia designated by the President under the terms of said act; or from calling into immediate military service persons classed as skilled experts in industry or agriculture, however classified or wherever residing.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from New Jersey if this joint resolution takes care of the situation which arose from the fact that in many communities throughout the land the number of aliens was excessive, and that under the original act the burden of the draft has fallen very heavily upon these communities?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I understand that that is one of the purposes of the joint resolution.

Mr. CALDER. I am very glad that the Military Affairs Committee has asked for the consideration of this measure. It is a matter of very great importance and ought to have immediate action before the new draft goes into effect.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "Joint resolution providing for the calling into military service of certain classes of persons registered and liable for military service under the terms of the act of Congress approved May 18, 1917, entitled 'An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States.'"

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Harding	Nugent	Sterling
Beckham	Hardwick	Overman	Stone
Borah	Henderson	Owen	Sutherland
Colt	Johnson, S. Dak.	Pittman	Thompson

Hale	Norris	Smoot

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I announce the absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], by reason of illness.

Mr. LEWIS. Let me announce the absence of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] upon official business. I also announce the absence of the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] and of the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] because of illness.

Mr. NORRIS. I have been requested to announce that both the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] are absent from the city in attendance upon the funeral of the wife of the senior Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] on official business. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on account of illness in his family.

Mr. KNOX. I have been requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] on account of illness, and the absence of the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] on account of official business.

Mr. HOLLIS. I have been requested to announce that the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] is absent on official business, and that the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] is absent because of illness; also that the senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] is necessarily detained.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

WAR FINANCE CORPORATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3714) to provide further for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the first amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. The first amendment passed over was in section 5, on page 4, line 3, after the words "of the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; in line 4, after the word "provided," to strike out "shall devote their entire time to the business of the corporation (except such part of their time, if any, as shall be devoted to other governmental business) and"; in line 10, after the word "not," to strike out "however"; in the same line, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "the annual salary of the principal officer of an executive department of the United States" and insert "$12,000"; in line 14, after the words "from the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; in line 18, after the words "by the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; in line 19, after the words "of the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; in line 22, before the words "shall designate," to strike out "Secretary of the Treasury" and insert "President of the United States"; in line 23, after the word "years," to strike out "No director or officer of the corporation shall continue to be an officer, director, or trustee of any other corporation or member of any firm of bankers; and, before" and insert "Any director shall be subject to removal by the President of the United States"; on page 5, line 4, before the word "entering," to insert "Before"; and in line 5, after the word "shall," to strike out "certify under oath to the Secretary of the Treasury that he has complied with this requirement, and shall also," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. That the four directors of the corporation appointed as hereinbefore provided shall receive annual salaries, payable monthly, the amount of which shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President of the United States, not exceeding $12,000. Any director receiving from the United States any salary or compensation for services shall not receive as salary from the corporation any amount which, together with any salary or compensation received from the United States, would make the total amount paid to him by the United States and by the corporation exceed the amount fixed as the annual salary of a director of the corporation, as hereinbefore provided. Of the four directors appointed, as hereinbefore provided, the President of the United States shall designate two to serve for two years, and two for four years; and thereafter each director so appointed shall serve for a term of four years. Any director shall be subject to removal by the President of the United States. Before entering upon his duties, each director and officer shall take an oath faithfully to discharge the duties of his office. But nothing contained in this act or in the Federal reserve act shall be construed to prevent the appointment of a member of the Federal Reserve Board or of any other governmental administrative body or of a director of a Federal reserve bank as a director of the corporation.

Mr. HOLLIS. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee, the Senator from North Carolina, what reason moved the committee to make that change in the original draft?

Mr. SIMMONS. The only reason that presented itself to the committee that I know was that it was not usual, although it has been done, I think, in one case, in the case of the Federal reserve banks, to provide that a Federal officer should give his entire time to the work. That might mean that he could not take the time that was necessary to attend to some incidental business matter. It might mean that he would have to devote his time so exclusively to this work that he would not be able to attend to those business matters to which every man must give more or less time.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, on this side of the aisle we can not hear the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I said the reason for striking out that part of the section as well as striking out the subsequent provisions of the section which relates to holding a permanent position in other corporations was that with those provisions in the Secretary of the Treasury may find himself unable to secure suitable men for these positions. If a director was required to give his entire time to this work, if he is required to give up his connection as a director of every other corporation or bank or trust company, it might require such great sacrifices on his part that the Secretary would not be able to secure competent men to perform the service. These directors, the committee thought, ought to be men of large familiarity with the financial business conditions of the country. That class of men generally have a great many connections with business enterprises of the country. The requirement to separate themselves entirely from every business connection, so far as occupying an official position in connection with the corporations through which that business is conducted, is coupled with the requirement that they shall give their sole and exclusive time to this work. I was impressed, and I think the committee were impressed, with the thought that it would be very difficult to get the class of men we all ought to want on this board. That is the only reason I know of.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. Of course, that would be true with reference to members of the Federal Reserve Board as well, would it not?

Mr. SIMMONS. I stated that there was one instance in which Congress has required that the officer should give his entire time, and I referred to the directors of the Federal Reserve Board, but I am not aware that that has been the custom in creating offices. That is the only instance that has been brought to my attention in which that provision has been coupled with the qualifications of a man for an official position.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask the Senator if he does not think it would be better, even if we had to pay a large salary of, say, $25,000 to $50,000 a year to these men, and to provide that no one who is connected with a commercial institution or is a director of a commercial institution shall hold this position? I heard the speech of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] on yesterday, and I was very much impressed with his statement that in his opinion it would inspire confidence among all the people of this country to have men appointed to this responsible position who were disassociated from the large commercial institutions.

Does not the Senator think it would be wiser to increase the salary of these men, and then prohibit the appointment of men who are active directors of banking and other financial institutions?

Mr. SIMMONS. I would agree with the Senator if we could secure suitable men who would be willing to abridge their personal rights with reference to their business matters to the extent that this provision would abridge it. I think it would be better, but I doubt very much whether you could procure in that way the right class of men.

I wish to say to Senators that, so far as I am concerned, after stating the reasons which the committee had for striking out these provisions of the bill, if the Senate sees fit to insert them I shall myself make no further opposition.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I merely wish to say to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] that if this corporation was to be a permanent affair, if it was the same as the Federal Reserve Board, to exist for 50 years or more, I would be in favor of the original wording of the bill. But this is only a temporary organization.

Mr. OWEN. I remind the Senator that he is overlooking the fact that the term is limited to 10 years.

Mr. SMOOT. I call 10 years a temporary position.

Mr. OWEN. Not for a Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Not for a Senator, but for a business man, who has an established business, a calling in life and knows nothing else but that one line of business. It is a temporary position, and I wish to say that even it may not last for 10 years under the provisions of the bill. The war may cease next year, and the declaration may be made by the President that it has ceased, and then the affairs of this concern would be wound up before the end of 10 years. If only a temporary organization, we should secure the very best men there are in the United States as members of the board of the corporation. I do not believe that we ought to put a provision in the bill that will limit the number of men from which selections can be made and virtually say that any man who has made a notable success in his line of business shall not be a member of this board. That is why I favor striking out the provision that was written in the bill by the framers of the bill.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. Admitting it is true, as the Senator has stated, that this is only a temporary position, is there any reason to believe that we can not find men among these great financiers who are patriotic enough to devote at least a part of their time during the war to financing the country?

Mr. SMOOT. The director in the corporation could not devote only a part of his time, because the wording is that they shall devote their entire time to the business.

Mr. GRONNA. I suppose it means that they should devote all their time while they were holding the position as director in the corporation. I did not mean to intimate that they should only serve a part of the time during the period they would act as a director; but is it not reasonable to suppose that there are hundreds, yes, thousands, of men in this country who have made a financial success who do not require making any more money, who have sufficient, and who are also willing to sacrifice, if need be, in order to win this war. We have more than 100,000,000 people in this country, and with all the millionaires and billionaires we have to-day, is it not possible to find some one willing to give time to this important institution for the benefit of the whole country and not for private parties or corporations? I say, if we are in such a deplorable condition that the men who made these fortunes are unwilling to sacrifice at least a few years of their time and contribute their time not even as a gratuity but for reasonable pay, I believe we are in a very dangerous position, and I do not think we ought to enact the bill at all.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say that there are thousands of financiers in the country who are perfectly willing to give their time to the Government during this war period and there are thousands of them who are giving their time to the Government now at a compensation of a dollar a year. But, Mr. President, we have heard on the floor of the Senate criticism time and time again against the Government accepting the services of these so-called captains of industry without compensation, and we have heard Senators from time to time say that no man ought to be employed by the Government of the United States and placed in a responsible position, as they are placed in to-day, without the Government paying for their services.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The men who will perform this function will be paid a salary. I do not understand that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] asks that they do this service for nothing, but he objects to men performing this particular duty when in the performance of that duty the public interests and their private interests may clash; we all realize that however honest a man may be—

> Where self the wavering balance shakes
> 'Tis rarely right adjusted.

It is not fair to the man appointed to place him in a position where he is called upon to decide this delicate question of propriety, nor is it altogether fair to the public.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say in answer to the Senator that I do not believe the President of the United States will select a man with no more honesty in his make-up than to accept such a position and then stoop so low as to take advantage of it, but I believe he will select men in whom the people have confidence and whom the President has confidence, and the Senate must have confidence in them, for the Senate will be asked to confirm their nomination.

The original wording it seems to me would cast reflection upon a man who might be selected as a director. Under the Senate amendment we broaden the number of persons from which the selections can be made. We make it just as broad as possible so that the President of the United States can nominate any man in the United States as a director. I do not believe there is a single man in the United States who has brains enough to fill such a position who would refuse to accept the nomination if requested to by the President.

But it is said he should be required to devote his entire time to the corporation. Suppose he went off for a week end or took a rest for a week, it is just like many people in the United States to find fault with him and say he is violating the law. If there was a necessity for such a requirement I would be in favor of it. If it was a permanent organization I would be in favor of it. But, Mr. President, it is a temporary appointment and I do not believe that you ought to ask men who are now engaged in business, and no doubt a lifelong business, to give it up entirely, or if perchance they are directors in a corporation and have been perhaps from the inception of the business and have seen the business grow, I do not believe they ought to be asked to resign as a director in a corporation because they are asked to serve as a director of this corporation if the work required does not conflict. If they are men whom you can not trust do not appoint them, and if such men are appointed let the Senate refuse to confirm them.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the services that will be required under this act will be the services of those who are peculiarly acquainted with financial conditions in the United States. Those who will be selected must necessarily be from a class who are so acquainted and who have the ability to bring to the service of the Government the greatest possible knowledge upon that particular subject. It was the purpose of the amendment to so widen the scope of the field of opportunity for the President himself to make a selection of men with the greatest degree of capability who would fill these places.

Every Senator knows that to-day the men who have the greatest knowledge of these subjects are as a rule either presidents or vice presidents or members of a board of directors. They are the men who are alive and doing the business of the country to-day. Why should the President say to a man who is upon the board of directors of a great financial institution, "You must get off this board." Possibly that board may need his services; it may not be for more than one day in a month, and yet it needs his services. But without this amendment you would say to him, "We can not accept your services if you are to give even one day a month at a meeting of your directors to look after your own institution." I do not believe the country is going to suffer by reason of a member of this board taking a day off to attend to the private business of a director. I believe the chances are that the President may not be able to secure exactly the kind of men he needs to fill these positions unless he be given the opportunity to select from presidents or vice president or directors of any corporation.

There is no Senator here who gives his entire attention to the business of the country. Every one of them has his own private business to look after to some extent. I do not believe that the country suffers because he has private business to look after. On the contrary, I think if he had no business to look after he would hardly be fit to hold a place in the Senate or to hold any other position.

Mr. President, it seems to me that we broaden the field of opportunity and give the President a scope of opportunity to select just the class of men he wants, and he wants the very best there are in the land. We ought not to say to him, "You can not select such a man unless you compel him to resign from the directorship of a banking institution which he assists in controlling."

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, there are two parts of this proposed amendment. The first is that these directors shall devote their entire time to the business of the corporation. That has been stricken out by the committee. It is assumed by striking it out that they could manage this corporation with four thousand five hundred million dollars of property by giving only a part of their time. Probably the biggest bank in the United States has a capital of $50,000,000, with assets possibly running up as high as six or seven hundred million dollars, but this bank will start off with $500,000,000 of actual capital drawn out of the Treasury of the United States, and then will have the authority to raise four thousand million dollars, or eight times as much, by bonds. These funds, moreover, will partake of the nature of a revolving fund. It will not be limited to the four thousand five hundred million dollars. It may be converted into revolving funds and involve a larger line of activities.

The work being laid out here, while expressed in a few words, is perfectly gigantic. I think Senators ought not to fail to observe that we are imposing upon these men a duty which obviously must require all of the time of whoever devotes himself to it. So much for the first part of the amendment.

The second part which the amendment proposes to strike out is that no director or officer of the corporation shall continue to be an officer, director, or trustee of any other corporation or member of any firm of bankers. I do not think it turns so much upon the honesty of the man as that he shall be able to give his time to the gigantic labor which is contemplated by the bill.

It does not avail to say that we will select honest men and therefore there is no necessity for requiring all their time to be given. It is better, indeed, as a public policy, to have men in charge of such a high function not swayed by private interest. I think it would suffice, probably, to say that they should not continue as active officers, leaving the question of the possibility of their having a private interest which might interfere with the discharge of their functions to be passed upon by those who consider the question of the nomination. But I am very sure that the entire time will be required of those who undertake to handle this gigantic institution, the biggest institution, probably, in the world, as a banking establishment. The Bank of England has a deposit of only $1,000,000,000. Here is one that will have funds to handle four times as great. The days are short; there are only 8 or 10 hours in an ordinary working day in which a man can judiciously apply himself to intellectual labor. I think it would be a serious mistake to deal with this question as a matter requiring only a part of the time.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I opposed the amendment that is proposed here by the committee when it was before the committee at the time, and inasmuch as it is about to be voted upon I feel like stating the reasons which actuated me at the time to offer such opposition. It was not because I feared the honesty of the men who might be selected, but rather because I felt that this is a most unusual law. We are conferring power about which I think every Senator has some doubt. I think there are very few Senators who look with perfect complacency upon this legislation; but we are all forced to support it, because we think an emergency has arisen and now confronts us which requires perhaps that extraordinary powers should be exerted through this corporation. Already it has been subject to the criticism that it might do things which would result disastrously. We all know that there is criticism more or less extant throughout the United States of the system of appointing men to high positions who are interested in the subject matter or similar subject matter to those dealt with under the proposed statute. It therefore seemed to me that it was the wise plan to avoid all suspicion as far as possible. I believe that any man who will be selected for this position, no matter what his position may be and how important it may be, will be willing for the public good to divest himself of interest in other concerns in order that he may render the most efficient service possible on this board. It was, therefore, more as a matter of policy with me than anything else, that I thought and I think now it is wise to consider in legislation of this magnitude; and that the provision of the bill itself is better than the one proposed by the committee.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I devoted some time yesterday to explaining the bill to the Senate and pointing out some of the dangers that I saw in it. I called the corporation to be established under the bill a bank, and it is a bank. No one denies it; but for some reason the friends of the measure are afraid to call it a bank and insist upon calling it by some more euphonious title.

The bill was brought here by the Secretary of the Treasury, so I am informed, and it was referred to the Committee on Finance. It is to be assumed that the bill was drawn about as the Secretary of the Treasury wanted it. I have not heard anyone argue enthusiastically for the bill in any particular. Those who are for it are for it with much apology, and with very little explanation of its need. It is a bad bill, and the only reason it is excusable is because there is a bad situation. I hope the Senate will make it as palatable for those of us who do not approve of it as is possible.

Now, here is a great bank, with powers never before granted to any bank in the United States or probably anywhere else. It is to be put in the sole charge of five directors, of whom the Secretary of the Treasury is one. The time of the Secretary of the Treasury is absorbed in matters of great importance. The duties involved in the handling of the business of the Treasury alone are more than one man can fairly cope with in war times, and the present Secretary of the Treasury has many other functions. He is the chairman of the Farm Loan Board; he is the Director General of the Railroads of the country. He may, therefore, be safely left out of the reckoning so far as sitting on this board of bank directors is concerned. All he can do will be to suggest general policies.

The men who are called to handle this great bank will be called to a position of great honor and of tremendous responsibility. I have no idea where the men will be found. It is suggested by the Senator from Utah that they will be great experts in financial affairs. They ought not to be. They should be merchants, as are the directors of the Bank of England. England will not permit its captains of finance to be on the directorate of its one great bank. As the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] said last week, finance should be the handmaiden of commerce and not the director of commerce. This bank is to serve the commercial interests of the United States, and through the commercial interests to serve us all. Financiers should be disqualified from being on this board at all, but the Senators who argue that they should not lay aside their financial duties and private interests evidently think they must be financiers. If they are to be financiers, if there are no other men in the country who are fit to sit on the board of this bank, it is because the duties of the bank require remarkable services. If the duties of the bank require remarkable services, those services should be rendered solely to the bank.

I referred yesterday to the fact that these men must be superfinanciers. I meant by that that they must be above the ordinary financiers. Even though they have other important duties, they should gladly lay aside those duties and come to the call of their country. I suspect that some of those who favor this phraseology have in mind men who they think are solely fitted to run the affairs of this great bank, and that those men have been seen and have said that they will not give up their private business. I suspect that; I am afraid of it.

If the Secretary of the Treasury wanted the bill drawn in this way, and if the Secretary of the Treasury insists on having this bill passed granting these tremendous powers, then the wishes of the Secretary of the Treasury ought to be respected by the Senate, for the Secretary of the Treasury is going to be gauged by this measure. For myself I do not believe it will be a success. I think that hereafter Senators and members of the administration will be trying to evade responsibility for it. But let us give it the fairest possible chance; let us treat the proposed corporation like a great bank, as we treated the Federal Reserve Banking System; let us throw the safeguards around these men that we threw around the members of the Federal Reserve Board; and I ask the Senate, since no one or very few seem to care particularly about this Senate committee amendment, to vote it down and to restore the bill to its original form.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not care to enter into any further discussion with respect to this amendment, but I do want to call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to the fact that the prohibition to which he refers is not confined to officers and directors of banks alone, as his remarks would imply, or at least would seem to imply. It is broader and provides that—

> No director or officer of the corporation shall continue to be an officer, director, or trustee of any other corporation.

It does not make any difference whether or not it is a financial corporation; no man who happens to be a director of a business corporation is eligible under that language. A merchant whose business has been incorporated would be disqualified under that language.

If the purpose of the Senator from New Hampshire in offering this amendment is to dissociate the directors of this corporation from interests that might possibly be affected by their action as members of the corporation, he will not accomplish that purpose by simply saying that they shall not be directors of any other corporation. In order to accomplish that purpose, if that is his purpose—and it seems to be—he will have to provide that they shall give up any business in which they have an interest in any corporation or any bank or any other concern which happens to be operating under charter. If they are required to give up their business, then, of course, their selfish interest will be removed if it conflicts in the slightest with their duties as directors; but simply to require them to cease to be directors of corporations does not reach the object.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GERRY in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. OWEN. I desire to suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill that the end of securing the time of the members of this board could be accomplished simply by putting in the word "active," providing that they shall not continue to be active directors, and so forth; that their time shall not be taken up with other employments of this kind.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course that would improve it very much.

Mr. OWEN. Because, after all, a man who has his properties invested need not be a director or an officer. A man may own a bank as a stockholder and may name every officer and employee in that bank and control its policy without being an officer or a director. Everybody knows that. Therefore, at last we have got to rely upon the integrity of mind of those who are put upon this board. I think, in view of the gigantic proportions of the establishment, with $4,500,000,000 to be disposed of by it as a banking institution, the men who compose the board of directors ought to give all of their time to its duties. I think the public interest requires that they give all of their time to their duties when the United States puts such an enormous trust in the hands of any men. They ought not to be able to treat it negligently and to give only a fraction of their time to the discharge of their duties.

Mr. SIMMONS. I agree with the Senator from Oklahoma with reference to their giving at least a sufficient portion of their time to the discharge of their duties; all the time that is necessary to efficiently discharge the duties ought to be given; but even when this language is stricken out they will be under the same obligation and responsibility to their consciences and to the Government of giving to this office such time as is adequate for the official discharge of its duties.

We do not, Mr. President, in creating an office say that the official shall give his entire time to it, and yet we all understand whenever a man is appointed to a Federal office that he assumes the obligation of giving to the discharge of the duties of that office all the time that is necessary properly to perform those duties. It is not necessary to write that into the law; it is implied.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. OWEN. I wish to observe to the Senator that when the bill comes into the Senate with the very reasonable requirement that the entire time of the directors of this corporation shall be devoted to their public duties and then the Senate strikes it out of the bill, it is equivalent to putting an interpretation upon the bill that their entire time will not be required.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is stricken out because such a requirement is not ordinarily demanded and striking out the provision puts these officers, I think, upon a parity with every other officer of the United States Government to-day with the solitary exception of the provisions which are contained in the Federal reserve act.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina will agree with me that there would be very serious objection to a provision of that kind applying to ourselves or to Members of the other House of Congress.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think so.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yet we are expected to perform all the duties that are incumbent upon us.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish only to say in addition, Mr. President, that the remark of the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] seemed to imply that members of the Finance Committee and other Senators had no interest in this matter. I myself am in favor of the amendment of the committee. The remark I made when I first had the floor upon the amendment, to the effect that the Senate could deal with it as it pleased, simply meant to convey to the Senate the idea that whatever the Senate might do with reference to this amendment would be accepted as satisfactory.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to say merely a few words on this question. I want to compliment the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] on what he said just as he sat down, when he expressed a willingness to abide by what the Senate might do. It is a relief to know that all of us are absolutely free to vote as we see fit on this amendment; but it does seem to me, Mr. President, that we ought to remember in passing on this amendment, and on all other amendments to this bill, that there is not anything like this bill on the statute books of any country in the world. There is hardly anything with which we can compare it. To my mind it is not fair to compare the duties of the directors of the proposed corporation to the duties of ordinary directors and presidents and other officials of corporations and of banks, because the importance of the greatest of corporations and the largest of banks sinks into insignificance when we compare it with the colossal proposition that is presented before us in this bill. These directors will have charge not of a bank doing an ordinary banking business or a corporation doing the ordinary business of a corporation, but they will have something to do with all of the corporations, with all of the banks, and with all of the business of all of the country. It is the most gigantic proposition that ever was conceived of; it is one that all of us stand almost in awe of; and yet we feel that something of the kind ought to be provided by law.

It is not an aspersion upon any man or upon his honesty or his patriotism to say that when he takes a position on the board of directors of this great institution he ought to give up active connection with any other corporation or any other bank as a manager or officer of any kind. That does not imply that we are suspicious of that man; but there are several reasons to my mind why he ought to be compelled so to do. First, the very magnitude of the undertaking. If he devotes all of his time every day to the work, he will not be able fully to comprehend all of the business of this great institution. The country ought to have all of his energy and all of his ability, and so his mind ought to be entirely divorced from private business, from the management of other corporations, or from the control of any private banking institution, because he will deal with people engaged in that class of business.

It is said by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] that, even though he is not allowed to be a director or an officer of a corporation, he still may have an interest in a corporation. That may be true, and I can conceive how it might be possible that his private interests might even in that case come in conflict with his public duty; but I am not going on the theory that he would permit his private interests to control his public duty if he accepted this place. However, he will occupy a different position as a director of this corporation if he is only a stockholder in a bank than though he were president of that bank. If he be president of that bank, he has a responsibility resting on him that will take his time and his thought. Even though he may say, "I will not devote any time to it," his mind would advert to the business of that bank; it would be an impossibility for him to divorce himself entirely from its affairs, because he would know there was a responsibility on him. That would be natural and perfectly proper; but that responsibility he could not throw off, and he would not be quite so competent to serve on this great corporation in such a case as though his mind were perfectly free and had no responsibility of any kind in the control or management of any other bank or any other corporation.

There is another reason, Mr. President. The members of this board of directors ought, like Cæsar's wife, to be free even of suspicion. They will come in contact with private institutions and private banking firms and corporations, and if they are officers or managers of such institutions their competitors will be suspicious, and even those who are not competitors with them in business will perhaps look with some degree of suspicion upon their activities as members of this great institution. We want and we need, Senators, the confidence of the country in this great corporation as much as in any institution ever created by law. We want the people from the very highest to the very lowest degree to believe and have faith that this great corporation is absolutely above everything except the welfare of our entire country and all the business of it. So we ought to free it if we can from any possibility of such suspicion.

Mr. President, it is said that if we provide that these men shall devote their entire time to this business and shall not be officers of any other corporation or managers of any other bank we will expect too much of a sacrifice; that it will be a sacrifice for a man to surrender his private position. That is true; it will be a sacrifice probably, but are we going to say that there is any man here in the United States who is not patriotic enough to make that sacrifice? We all make sacrifices. The boy in the trenches who gives up a salary of $2,500 a year to go out as a mark for enemy bullets in a foreign land surrenders his position and takes another one at $30 a month. He makes the sacrifice under the draft law, and we require many of our citizens to make the same sacrifice. Are we to say now that a great captain of industry, who is president of a bank, would, if selected by the President to fill a place on this board of directors, say "I can not make that sacrifice"? If he is not willing to make that sacrifice, Mr. President, he will not be a good member of the board of directors, and ought to be left off it. It is not as great a sacrifice as thousands of his fellow citizens make. To my mind, there will be no difficulty in that.

I am not charging that there are any such men; I do not believe that there are. Furthermore, these men are not working for $30 a month or for a dollar a year. When they are appointed, under the terms of the bill the President will fix their salary, and there is only one limitation to the amount, and that is that the salary shall not exceed $12,000 a year. It is safe to say that the President will fix the salary at $12,000 a year. Is there any Senator who doubts it? The very passage of the bill with that provision in it is an invitation to the President to fix the salary at $12,000 a year. So when it comes to the question of pecuniary sacrifice these men are not going to make such a great sacrifice, for they will get $12,000 a year for their services, and if they get $12,000 a year ought they not to devote all their time to this great institution?

Mr. President, it seems perfectly clear to me that this ought to be required as a matter of law; it ought to be in the bill. It will help to free the entire proposition of any lingering suspicion that might rest anywhere; it will help to give moral force to whatever acts this board or corporation may perform, because to the degree that it is humanly possible it will remove any possibility of any of these men doing officially what may profit them privately.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, when I discussed this question a moment ago I was not aware that there were two propositions involved in it. I was directing myself then, as I did before the committee, to the last provision, the one at the bottom of page 4 and the top of page 5. I had no objection to striking out the words requiring these men to devote their whole time to this particular work, because I could not imagine a man appointed to this position if he were forbidden to serve any other interest outside, who would not devote to the task the time necessary to do the work. We do not generally apply such provisions to other officers, and, therefore, I can see no particular reason why those words should be left in. It seems to me they are superfluous. But what I was directing my attention to was the fact that we should require that these men during the time they are serving the Government should be divorced from any position of influence or profit which might be construed as interfering with their duties on this board.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I want to direct the attention of the Senate to the manner in which this question comes up. The bill originally contained the provision that the members of this bank board—shall devote their entire time to the business of the corporation (except such part of their time, if any, as shall be devoted to other governmental business).

The question will be on the amendment. Now, by adopting the committee amendment we can not wipe the slate clean. If any question ever comes up under this bill as to whether a member of the board is allowed to conduct other businesses, this copy of the bill will be conclusive evidence to the court that passes on it that the Senate had the matter up and the Senate deliberately voted that these men might be allowed to engage in as many other businesses as they pleased. You can not wipe the slate clean in that way. I hope Senators will vote "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. NORRIS (when the name of Mr. CUMMINS was called). I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and while I am on my feet I desire also to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]. Both Senators are absent in Iowa, attending the funeral of the wife of the senior Senator from that State. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. KNOX (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], who is absent on account of illness. I understand, however, that if he were present he would support the bill and the amendments reported by the committee, and I therefore feel at liberty to vote and vote "yea."

Mr. GRONNA (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], due to illness in his family. I wish this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I transfer the general pair which I have with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennslyvania [Mr. PENROSE], who is necessarily absent. I am informed, however, that if he were present he would vote "yea"; and I desire to vote "yea," and therefore shall so vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the junior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. BECKHAM. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. JAMES] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. RANSDELL. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. BROUSSARD] on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. HOLLIS. I have been requested to announce that the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] is absent on official business, and that the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] is absent because of illness. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. McNARY. I announce the absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. WATSON (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT].

I voted and have since discovered his absence from the Chamber. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Do I understand that we are voting on two amendments?

Mr. LODGE. No; only one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We are voting upon the first amendment.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] is detained by illness. I also wish to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] are necessarily detained.

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 32, as follows:

YEAS—36.

Beckham	Jones, Wash.	Page	Smoot
Calder	Kellogg	Ransdell	Swanson
Colt	Lewis	Robinson	Tillman
Dillingham	Lodge	Saulsbury	Townsend
Fernald	McNary	Sheppard	Wadsworth
Fletcher	Martin	Shields	Warren
France	Nelson	Simmons	Watson
Gallinger	New	Smith, Md.	Weeks
Gerry.	Overman	Smith, S. C.	Williams

NAYS—32.

Borah	Hardwick	Nugent	Smith, Mich.
Culberson	Henderson	Owen	Sterling
Curtis	Hollis	Pittman	Sutherland
Frelinghuysen	Johnson, S. Dak.	Poindexter	Thomas

Brandegee	James	McCumber	Stone
Broussard	Johnson, Cal.	McKellar	Walsh
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	McLean	Wolcott
Cummins	Kenyon	Penrose
Fall	King	Phelan

So the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I desire to give notice now that I reserve the right to have a separate vote on this amendment when the bill reaches the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. On line 25, page 4, and lines 1 and 2, page 5, it is proposed to strike out the following words:

No director or officer of the corporation shall continue to be an officer, director, or trustee of any other corporation or member of any firm of bankers; and, before—

And to insert in lieu thereof:

Any director shall be subject to removal by the President of the United States. Before.

Mr. TOWNSEND. On that amendment I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I think the Senate ought not to vote on that entire amendment without a division. I think most of the Senate believes in the words to be added:

Any director shall be subject to removal by the President of the United States.

I think the question should come first on striking out the words:

No director or officer of the corporation shall continue to be an officer, director, or trustee of any other corporation, or member of any firm of bankers.

I therefore ask to have the question divided.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the amendment of the committee in lines 3 and 4 is not a substitute for the other amendment, proposing to strike out certain words.

Mr. HOLLIS. No; it is not.

Mr. SMOOT. They are two separate and distinct propositions, and I think the Senator from New Hampshire is perfectly right.

Mr. SIMMONS. They ought to appear in the bill as two amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I ask for a vote on the first amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to have the amendment stated.

The SECRETARY. Beginning on page 4, line 25, it is proposed to strike out the following words:

No director or officer of the corporation shall continue to be an officer, director, or trustee of any other corporation or member of any firm of bankers; and, before.

Mr. NORRIS. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I move a substitute for that language, to read:

No director or officer of the corporation shall continue to be an active officer, director, or trustee of any other corporation.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator state that amendment again? We could not hear him.

Mr. OWEN. I move a substitute, to read:

No director or officer of the corporation shall continue to be an active officer, director, or trustee of any other corporation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think the proper way would be to vote upon the committee amendment, and then, if the committee amendment is agreed to, offer the amendment just suggested by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 1, before the word "officer," it is proposed to insert the word "active."

Mr. OWEN. That was not my amendment, Mr. President. I move a substitute for the words to be stricken out, to read:

No director or officer of the corporation shall continue to be an active officer, director, or trustee of any other corporation.

Mr. SMOOT. That is offered as a substitute, Mr. President, and——

Mr. OWEN. The effect of it is to strike out and insert.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, may the substitute be stated, please?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the substitute.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the words proposed to be stricken out by the committee on page 4, line 25, and on lines 1 and 2, page 5, it is proposed to insert the following words:

No director or officer of the corporation shall continue to be an active officer, director, or trustee of any other corporation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. Assuming that this substitute shall be agreed to, would the amendment of the committee to strike out then be the next motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would; yes.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I want to understand. If this amendment is agreed to, then the committee amendment has been disposed of.

SEVERAL SENATORS. No; it has not.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, let us have an understanding.

Mr. LODGE. The motion of the Senator from Oklahoma is a motion to strike out and insert; and if that motion is agreed to, the words offered by the Senator from Oklahoma go into the bill and stay there.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, as I understood, the Senator from Oklahoma offered his amendment as a substitute for the committee amendment.

Mr. LODGE. The committee amendment is a motion to strike out.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that. I think we all know that. Is that true, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the way the Chair understands the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I make the point that that motion is improper, because, if that motion should prevail, it would do away entirely with the committee amendment to strike out, or it would substitute something else to be stricken out, and the motion to strike out would still be pending.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma shall be adopted it will be an amendment to the committee amendment. Then the question will recur upon the amendment as amended, as I understand.

Mr. OWEN. That is right.

Mr. NORRIS. But the committee amendment is to strike out certain words. The motion of the Senator from Oklahoma is a substitute for that, to strike out the same words and insert other words. Now, suppose that prevails: You have substituted something in the bill that the committee has moved to strike out, and it ends it, and you do not get a chance to vote on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. VARDAMAN. No; if the Senator will pardon me, the question then recurs on the amendment offered by the committee, which has been amended by the motion made by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, Rule XVIII of the Senate provides that a motion to strike out and insert one proposition shall not prevent a motion to strike out and insert a different proposition. I understand that that is the proposition of the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the words which the Senator from Oklahoma desires to strike out are in the bill. The fact that the committee has recommended their amendment does not change that fact. Now, the Senator moves to strike out those words in the bill and to insert in lieu of them certain other words. If the Senate shall adopt that course, I take it that that would mean that the other words that he suggests would be inserted in the place of these. Having that view about it, I believe that the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma is a good amendment, and I am perfectly willing to accept it, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? If the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma should prevail, would the bill then read as it read when it came from the House?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; with the change that he proposes.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly. We would not have any opportunity at all then to vote upon the motion to strike out that part which came from the House.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, as I understand the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma, it is not to strike out, but it is to insert the word "active." If I understood the reading, that is all his amendment does. Now, of course the Senate has a right to amend the provision which it is proposed to strike out. Then the vote comes upon whether or not it shall be stricken out. Am I correct? Will the Senator from Oklahoma inform me whether he does more than simply insert a word?

Mr. OWEN. Yes. My amendment accepts the committee amendment which strikes out the words "or member of any firm of bankers," and would leave the language of the bill to read:

No director or officer of the corporation shall continue to be an active officer, director, or trustee of any other corporation.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator does strike out the words following "corporation." Of course, then, that changes the situation. I thought the Senator had simply introduced the word "active."

Mr. OWEN. My amendment, in effect, would strike out the words following the word "corporation," namely, "or member of any firm of bankers; and, before."

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then, Mr. President, it should be clear that if the motion of the Senator should prevail that will dispose of the whole matter.

Mr. OWEN. It will.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma, of course, could adopt the course suggested by the Senator from Michigan and offer one or more perfecting amendments to the language proposed to be stricken out. He has not taken that course. He has taken a course which he is entitled to take, and which precedes a simple motion to strike out, and that is a motion to strike out and insert. A motion to strike out and insert obviously always takes precedence of a plain motion to strike out.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, while the Senator from Massachusetts is on the floor may I ask him a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. If the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma prevails, then will that portion of the bill which the committee proposes to strike out remain in the bill?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly not. It will go out, and its place will be taken by the language proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; but then we will have no opportunity to pass upon the other proposition.

Mr. LODGE. No; except when the bill is in the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the substitute.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, before the vote is taken, I should like to ask a question of the Senator who offers the substitute. He introduces into the bill the language "an active member." What does he mean by that?

Mr. OWEN. The purpose of my proposed amendment is that these men shall not have any other occupation to divert them from this service which we are putting upon them.

Mr. REED. But they could still be directors of a corporation.

Mr. OWEN. Oh, yes; they might own the corporation, and not be directors.

Mr. REED. One of them could still be the president of the corporation.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; and he might own the corporation and not be the president.

Mr. REED. I understand that.

Mr. OWEN. I am just seeking to provide by my amendment that a man's eligibility shall not be denied by his being an officer, but shall depend upon the time he can give. I only propose precluding those whose time is otherwise engaged by being active officers of other corporations. Of course, he ought not to pass on a case where his own interests are involved.

Mr. REED. But the Senator intends to allow him to retain that interest, and intends to allow him to retain an office also, in addition to that interest, provided he is not active in the office. The question I am raising is, what we gain by introducing the word "active."

Mr. OWEN. The intention was to gain time.

Mr. REED. Time?

Mr. OWEN. Yes. The aspect which the Senator has in mind is another aspect entirely.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is, the time that they can give.

Mr. OWEN. The time that they can give was all that I was trying to accomplish, because I do not think I can accomplish any more, if I can accomplish that much.

Mr. REED. I have this observation to make touching the amendment: It seems to concede that there should not be an outside interest that would interfere with the performance of the duties.

Mr. OWEN. I should hope so.

Mr. REED. And that, the Senator thinks, is a desirable thing to accomplish. The Senator wants to cut off outside interference, and he therefore proposes to say that an officer shall not be an active officer. Now, I do not think we gain anything by that.

If a man is an officer, he must in some way perform the duties of that office. If he is the president of a corporation, he must do something in that capacity. If he is the director of a corporation, he must do something in that capacity. We either ought to cut off their right to be concerned in the ownership of a corporation that has any business connection with this corporation, or else we ought to impose no restrictions at all, in my judgment.

I think that the proper restriction to place here is that this corporation shall not do any business with any other corporation if any of its members are officers or directors or substantial stockholders in such other corporation, and I should be glad to support such an amendment. I make this distinction: Here is a corporation that ought to call for a very high class of talent, and we can hardly expect to find that kind of talent unless we find the possessor of it to be also interested in the business affairs of the country; and I should dislike to deny to this corporation the employment of that character of talent. At the same time, however, I think it would be utterly wrong to permit this corporation to do any business with a corporation having officers or substantial stockholders represented as officers of this corporation. If this can take some such form that I can prepare such an amendment I will offer it, and I think the chairman of the committee probably would feel inclined to accept that proposition.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I ask permission to withdraw the amendment I proposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma requests permission to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just a moment. As I understood the Senator from Oklahoma to state that he would withdraw his amendment for the moment, and as I am in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma as against the amendment of the committee, I am going to vote against the amendment of the committee with the idea that the Senator from Oklahoma will offer his amendment later.

Mr. President, I want to say just a word in answer to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. It is not the intention of this bill to advance money for banks to speculate upon or for public utilities to speculate upon. The object of this bill is to assist certain business corporations of this country to refund their bonded indebtedness and for extension of business necessary for the prosecution of the war; and the necessity for so doing is because the Government of the United States has monopolized the money market of the United States. I do not care how good a credit an institution may have in this country; if they have large issues of bonds falling due this year, they can not secure the money to meet them unless they get it through this or some similar corporation. It is an impossibility; I do not care what kind of credit they may have.

Do we want to penalize an institution by refusing assistance to it, which, if it should fail, may drag down other institutions to failure, because the President had appointed as director an officer or a member of the institution who had the attainments necessary to fill the position of director provided for in this bill. I do not believe Senators are going to take that position.

I am perfectly willing to say that the man appointed shall give the required time to the corporation. That would not include such a man as the cashier of a bank or a manager of a business. I think if there is a man preeminently qualified, who knows the value of the securities of this country, and the President of the United States wants him to serve as a member of the board, he should have the right to appoint him and not require him to resign, even if a director of another corporation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I was engaged and did not quite hear the first part of the Senator's remarks. Did he say that there was a corporation that had $10,000,000 of bonds coming due and that it could not renew its securities?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I did not put it that way, Mr. President. I stated that the Government of the United States has monopolized the money market in this country; that I care not what kind of security an institution may have if it has falling due a large issue of bonds, we might say twenty or thirty million dollars, it can not refund those bonds in the present condition of the money market unless we pass legislation along this line.

Mr. REED. Now, let us assume that there is such a corporation and it owes $10,000,000 and can not refund. Of course, it might be unable to refund because of the reason the Senator gives. It might be unable to refund because its securities were questioned.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, if the securities are questioned, I want to say it could not refund under the bill.

Mr. REED. I know, but suppose the president and the principal owner of the corporation was one of these directors, does the Senator think he ought to pass upon the question of $10,000,000 of security?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it is not a question of passing upon any particular $10,000,000 advance.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator think he ought to pass on that $10,000,000?

Mr. SMOOT. I think he could pass on that $10,000,000, or he should never have been appointed by the President.

Mr. REED. Now, let me interject another question, so that the Senator can reply to all at once. Then the Senator is asserting the principle that has been repudiated by every court of equity and every writer of law who has ever lived, that a man may sit and deal with the public moneys for his own use and benefit.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator had heard what I said in the beginning, he would have known that this legislation is not for the purpose of advancing money for speculation. That would be quite a different proposition. Such legislation as this was unheard of before this world war. There is not a Senator in this body who a year ago would have thought for a minute of voting for such legislation. We are up against a condition, not a theory, and, Senators, the business interests of the country must receive relief or failures will become general.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator will permit me, can you not so frame the law as to have it administered by men who will not take advantage of the law to promote their own private interests?

Mr. SMOOT. No such thing will happen under this provision. It is not a question now as to whether some director will want to save some particular business. It is a question of saving the business of the country as a whole. The question is for the Government of the United States to lend its credit to save all classes of business, for if any considerable number of them are allowed to fail, if one fails here and one fails there, unless assistance comes to business concerns of the country it will be like a house of cards, once beginning to fall it will all fall.

Mr. OWEN. Will the Senator permit me to suggest that the real amendment which is now before the Senate is not involved in the question raised by the Senator from Missouri, and we could take that up at a later time after we disposed of the matter which is now before the Senate?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Oklahoma is right. The only reason why I made the statement I did was in answer to a statement the Senator from Missouri made.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to suggest that it would be perfectly easy to provide that no member of this board should pass upon questions in which his corporation was interested, and that would probably meet the point of view of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SMOOT. It may be for the public interest to save the institution that one member of this board was interested in. It may be an institution that, if it was allowed to fail, would be the beginning of a panic in the United States; and that must not be allowed. The business institutions of the country would not require assistance in ordinary times, but the situation, and every Senator knows it, is that the Government of the United States has monopolized entirely the money market of the United States and will do so as long as this war lasts, thus preventing money flowing in its regular channels.

While I am on my feet I may say this, Mr. President, that if the war lasts two more years I look for this corporation to advance money to institutions upon securities that would not be considered adequate in ordinary times. The situation is serious, and as long as the Government of the United States has credit she dare not allow business institutions to begin to fail in large numbers, because if such a thing is allowed there will be a financial catastrophe, and the credit of our Nation will be impaired. You must not think for a minute that if the war continues for another year we will not be running the institutions of this country and paying the debts of our Government by paper money. Inflation will be the order of the day, as every other Government involved in this war to-day is running upon inflated currency.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. Is it not true that this bill means inflation?

Mr. SMOOT. Before we really have actual inflation I will say there would have to be an amendment to the Federal reserve act, because the Federal reserve act limits the issue of paper money to $2,500,000,000, with a 40 per cent gold reserve back of all issues. But I have no more question but that limit will be increased than that I stand here, if the war continues another year. It is then that actual inflation will take place. Actual inflation will take place before we ever reach the $4,500,000,000 limit provided for in this bill; but, as I said, that can not happen until the present Federal reserve law is amended.

With the statement I have made I am perfectly willing now to vote against the amendment offered by the committee, with the hope that the Senator from Oklahoma will renew his motion to amend. I am willing to vote for his amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the vehemence of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is directed against the general financial condition and not to the proposition under discussion. He tells us that we are in a very bad way; that we are liable to become bankrupt; that the Government has withdrawn all the money from the country; that there is no money that can be obtained in the open market with which to finance institutions.

Mr. SMOOT. Credit, I said.

Mr. REED. Very well, the credit. Then the Senator says because that is the case we ought to permit men financially interested in dealings with the Federal corporation we are about to create to sit as members of that corporation and make dealings with themselves. The two propositions are entirely separate propositions. One is the financial condition of the country. That may be as bad as the Senator thinks and it may not be. The necessity for this bill may be very great, and I think we nearly all concede that the necessity is great; but in constructing the bill, in determining what safeguards shall be thrown about the bill, it seems to me that we can decide that question on its merits, and we should not confuse it with the question which the Senator from Utah so eloquently discussed.

Now, what is the question? Stated in plain, blunt language, it is this: Shall a man sit upon the board of directors of this Federal corporation, that is to loan the people's money and at the same time sit with a board of directors of a corporation that is to borrow the people's money from the Federal corporation? In other words, shall he do business with himself? It does not make any difference how great the financial emergency may be; that affords no excuse or reason for permitting a man who is a member of this board to loan our money, the people's money, to himself.

There are plenty of men who can be found who will transact this business for the country who will not find it necessary to borrow or to have dealing with the Government through this corporation, but if it is thought that a restriction which would forbid any man to be a director of the Federal corporation who is at the same time the director of any other corporation is thought to be too stringent, and I am inclined to think it is, then it seems to me there ought to be no question about saying that no man shall be a member of this Federal corporation and have dealings with himself or with the corporation in which he is interested; in other words, no director of this corporation ought to be permitted to act in any transaction between himself and any corporation in which he is interested. I am going to offer as a substitute for the committee's amendment to insert the following:

No director or officer of the corporation shall, directly or indirectly, participate in any transaction in which he is either directly or indirectly interested.

I am not certain in drawing that phrase as I stand on my feet that I have used the happiest language, but I think the thought is expressed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the words proposed to be stricken out by the committee it is proposed to substitute the following:

No director or officer of the corporation shall, directly or indirectly, participate in any transaction in which he is either directly or indirectly interested.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator I have not a particle of objection to that amendment.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It is all right.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the Senator has offered that as a substitute for the language proposed to be stricken out by the committee, beginning on line 25, page 4?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I accept it.

Mr. REED. I hope the conference will have a little more time to find a happier expression than I have employed.

Mr. SMOOT. We all agree upon the principle announced in the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HOLLIS. I understand the committee has accepted the amendment of the Senator from Missouri in lieu of its own amendment. If we could vote on adopting the amendment of the Senator from Missouri as a substitute for the committee amendment, and then vote on whether we want the committee amendment, I would be entirely agreeable, because the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri is a great improvement, but this provision should go at least as far as the provision contained in the bill as originally drawn. There is no particular danger of a man who is a director in a corporation, even in a bank, holding a membership on this board. That is not the trouble. The vice comes in having a member of a banking firm on the board of directors of this war bank, and I will state the reason. The director in an ordinary corporation usually has no individual liability whatever; the stockholder in an ordinary corporation or bank has no individual liability; but the member of a banking firm is liable for every cent of the firm's debts, because he is a partner. That may not be known to Members of the Senate. All the powerful banking concerns in this country are partnerships. There is good reason for that. They have to deal with themselves on the stock exchange. They have to deal with the stock exchange, and the stock exchange will not allow them to be members of the stock exchange unless they are partnerships, so that every partner is individually liable for every dollar's worth of debt. The danger is that some man who is a director in some great corporation will get on this board. The danger is that some man who is a member of a stock-exchange partnership known as a banking house will get on the board.

I hope the amendment will be rejected. If it is rejected we then have restored the original language in the bill, which forbids any man who is a director of another corporation or bank or member of a banking firm from being a member of the board of directors of this war bank.

I have directed the attention of the Senate to the real danger in the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri, which is well intended and which is much better than nothing, but it does not reach the real danger, and I call the attention of the Senate to it.

Mr. REED. The Senator makes the point that my amendment offered in this form shuts out the right to vote directly on the main proposition.

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes.

Mr. REED. I have no desire to do that. I would rather withdraw my amendment than be put in the position of jockeying anybody out of a vote.

Mr. HOLLIS. Oh, no; the Senator——

Mr. REED. I do not mean that unpleasantly. I mean to say that I do not want to do anything that will deny the fullest right to a vote.

Mr. HOLLIS. If the Senator will allow me, I suggest that we be allowed to vote on the Senate committee amendment to strike out certain language, and if the committee amendment is adopted then it will be open to the Senator to offer his amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me, it is immaterial whether the committee amendment is agreed to or disagreed to, the Senator from Missouri can offer his amendment in either case afterwards. He loses no right.

Mr. HOLLIS. The Senator is right, of course.

Mr. REED. I withdraw my amendment for that reason.

Mr. HOLLIS. Then that leaves us to vote squarely on the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the committee amendment to strike out certain words.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the words be read.

The SECRETARY. The committee proposes to strike out, on page 4, beginning at line 25, the words:

No director or officer of the corporation shall continue to be an officer, director, or trustee of any other corporation or member of any firm of bankers.

Mr. BORAH. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that if the Senate shall adopt the committee amendment I will then accept the substitute offered by the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the committee to strike out the words which have been read.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KNOX (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement that I made on the previous vote of my pair and its transfer I vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). Has the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator that my colleague is absent on business of the Senate and that if present he would vote with the committee. That may be a guide to the Senator in his vote.

Mr. WARREN. Then I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). The senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with whom I have a pair is necessarily absent. I am informed, however, that if he were present he would vote as I am about to vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is detained on official business.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Making the same announcement of my pair and its transfer as on the previous vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. WEEKS. Making the same transfer of my pair that I made on the previous vote, I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 37, as follows:

YEAS—31.

Bankhead	Hale	Myers	Swanson
Colt	Harding	Pomerene	Underwood
Dillingham	Knox	Robinson	Wadsworth
Fernald	Lodge	Saulsbury	Warren
Fletcher	McCumber	Sheppard	Weeks
France	McKellar	Shields	Williams
Gallinger	McLean	Simmons	Wolcott
Gerry	Martin	Stone

NAYS—37.

Borah	Kellogg	Pittman	Thomas
Calder	Kendrick	Poindexter	Thompson
Curtis	Kirby	Reed	Townsend
Frelinghuysen	McNary	Shafroth	Trammell
Gronna	Nelson	Sherman	Vardaman
Hardwick	New	Smith, Mich.	Watson
Henderson	Norris	Smith, S. C.
Hollis	Nugent	Smoot
Johnson, S. Dak.	Owen	Sterling

NOT VOTING—26.

Ashurst	Goff	King	Smith, Ariz.
Brandegee	Gore	La Follette	Smith, Ga.
Broussard	Hitchcock	Lewis	Smith, Md.
Chamberlain	James	Overman	Tillman
Culberson	Johnson, Cal.	Penrose	Walsh
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Phelan
Fall	Kenyon	Ransdell

So the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I move to insert the word "active" before the word "officer," in line 1, page 5, and to strike out line 2 after the word "corporation" and insert a period, so that it will read:

No director or officer of the corporation shall continue to be an active officer, director, or trustee of any other corporation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to say on behalf of the committee that I am willing to accept that amendment, and then I shall be glad to accept the substitute which I understand will be offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

On a division the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri whether he now intends to offer his amendment? If not, I will offer it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. Has there been an order of the Senate that committee amendments shall first be considered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is so informed.

Mr. PITTMAN. Unless the Senator from Missouri desires to offer an amendment to the committee amendment along the lines he has just proposed, I will do so.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the committee amendment to strike out this language was rejected, and now it is perfectly proper, of course, for any Senator to offer any amendment to this language. If, however, we have agreed to consider committee amendments first, we ought to dispose of them.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, with the language of the bill as it now is, I do not desire at this moment to present the amendment which I previously suggested. I suggested it then believing that the language that has been retained in the bill was to go out. I am, however, not satisfied with the language as it is, but such an amendment as I may want to propose I have not yet perfected. I am therefore quite willing that the Senator from Nevada should offer any amendment that he has in mind.

Mr. PITTMAN. Under the statement of the Senator from Missouri, I move to strike out, on line 25, page 4, commencing with the word "No" and including that word, down to and including the word "before," on the second line of page 5, and to insert——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not suppose there is any use of making suggestions as to the parliamentary order, but for the sake of putting it into the RECORD, I will say that under parliamentary law, as I have always understood it, where there is a motion to strike out or to strike out and insert, the language proposed to be stricken out is open to perfecting amendments before the motion to strike out is put. After the motion to strike out has been put and defeated, the language is not open to amendment at that stage, because the Senate has agreed on that precise form of words and has kept them in the bill. We have already amended it and I do not know that it makes any difference if we amend it again, but it is the most loose parliamentary proceeding that I ever saw.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, this matter was discussed before it came up, and a number of Senators desired to have an opportunity of voting on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I should not have voted as I did vote except with the understanding, which was very plain to this body, that various amendments were going to be added at this time.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to the Senator's amendment. On the contrary, I think I am for it, if I understand it correctly, as I was for the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri; but I merely suggest that this is not the stage when it should be offered. It has got to be offered in the Senate if it is properly offered.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I am inclined to agree with the Senator from Massachusetts; but as what I have stated was the understanding beforehand, my vote was governed accordingly. I now desire, under that understanding, to offer the amendment. If there is any objection, of course, I will have to wait.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, by unanimous consent we can do anything.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that the amendment is not in order at this time, because we are operating under the rule that committee amendments shall first be considered and disposed of; but I think that, in view of the situation, unanimous consent should be given for the consideration of this substitute at this time. I knew that several Senators voted against the Senate committee amendment because they expected that this substitute would be adopted. I have said that if the amendment was rejected I should, if the Senator from Missouri did not see fit to do so, myself offer a substitute. I therefore think, under the circumstances, that unanimous consent ought to be given for the consideration of this amendment at this time.

Mr. PITTMAN. I ask unanimous consent for that action.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent for the consideration of his amendment. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Let the amendment be read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the words:

No director or officer of the corporation shall continue to be an active officer, director, or trustee of any other corporation.

And to insert:

No director or officer of the corporation shall in any manner participate in the determination of any question affecting his personal interest or the interest of any corporation, partnership, or association in which he is directly or indirectly interested.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, just a word in regard to the amendment. I was thoroughly in accord with the purpose of the original provisions of the bill. The purpose was undoubtedly to guard against any of the directors of this institution taking part in the decision of a matter in which he was personally interested. I think, however, that the language is entirely too broad. I believe that it would be a fatal mistake to bar any man from serving the Government in this capacity simply because of the fact that he was a director in some banking institution. I believe that the very highest ability is called for in this undertaking. Indeed, I think the only danger of it lies in the fact that it may be put in incompetent hands. I believe there is far more danger from the mismanagement or the inefficiency of the management of the corporation than there is from corruption. I do not, however, see why we should not follow the regular law governing all corporations in this respect. No director of any corporation is permitted in equity to participate in any action of the board of directors in matters affecting himself. I have hurriedly drawn this language for the purpose of entirely eliminating the possibility of any director of this corporation participating in any manner, either in discussion or in voting, in the decision of any question in which he has a personal interest or any matter affecting the interest of any corporation or association or partnership in which he is directly or indirectly interested. I feel that that is as far as we may safely go in this matter, and that is the reason why I have offered the amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have had, since the Senator from Nevada has been speaking, an opportunity to give the language contained in this bill, and which we refused to strike out, a little further examination. As I now construe it, it seems to me that it simply means that before any man can be appointed to serve upon this board he must have absolutely ceased to be an officer or trustee of any corporation whatsoever. Now, that is going a good way. I am not sure but that it is broad enough to cover a directorship in a church corporation. I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada, which is an improvement in phraseology on the amendment I offered, ought to be adopted, and I think it ought to be followed by amending the succeeding language, which requires a certification under oath to the Secretory of the Treasury by the appointee that he has complied with this requirement. I think that language ought to be changed so that there shall be a certification under oath that the person appointed will comply with the requirement which would be provided in the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] to the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Now, Mr. President, if it is not out of order under the rule, I should like to suggest this amendment to the language which follows the next amendment. The language is:

Before entering upon his duties each director and officer shall certify under oath to the Secretary of the Treasury that he has complied with this requirement, and shall also—

And so forth.

Mr. President, I am aware that there is an amendment of the committee pending prior to the one that I am discussing, but I ask the chairman of the committee to transpose the proposed amendment of the committee to the end of the section, so that the language which will follow will apply to the amendment which has just been adopted.

Mr. SIMMONS. As I understand, the Senator proposes to retain the words that are stricken out in the committee amendment, namely:

Certify under oath to the Secretary of the Treasury that he has complied with this requirement—

And change it to "certify under oath to the Secretary of the Treasury that he will comply"——

Mr. REED. "That he will comply with this requirement."

Mr. SIMMONS. With the requirement of the substitute offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Would it not be better to ask for a reconsideration of the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to?

Mr. REED. It is not necessary to do that.

Mr. SMOOT. The committee amendment, as I understand, has been agreed to; it was agreed to last evening.

Mr. SIMMONS. The amendment to strike out was agreed to yesterday afternoon. That action will have to be reconsidered, and I have no objection to that being done, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. I can offer it as a new amendment with this new language in it.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator from Missouri, please——

Mr. SIMMONS. Just one moment. If the language of the committee's amendment which has been stricken out had remained in the bill, then the language I have just read requiring the certificate would have been proper. Now, the committee amendment has not been adopted, but there has been adopted for it a substitute which provides in substance that no director of this corporation shall have any personal interest in any transaction of the board. In that condition I think it will be very proper to require some sort of certificate to the effect that the appointee has no such interest. That is what I understand the Senator desires, and only that. The best way to do that, I should think, would be for the Senator to move to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let the Senator ask unanimous consent to offer the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, to reconsider the vote by which the amendment in lines 5, 6, and 7 was adopted.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I am very sure that the committee amendment has not been adopted. I asked last night that all the amendments to this section go over, and I am sure they all went over.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, I will ask the Chair if the committee amendment has been adopted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the committee amendment has not been adopted.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then the amendment of the Senator from Missouri is in order, and I accept the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Before the Senator accepts it, I should like the Senator from Missouri to restate it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I will state to the chairman of the committee what I want to accomplish. The amendment as it now stands reads as follows:

No director or officer of the corporation shall in any manner participate in the determination of any question affecting his personal interest or the interest of any corporation, partnership, or association in which he is directly or indirectly interested.

I now desire to have the section read following the amendment:

Before entering upon his duties each director and officer shall certify under oath to the Secretary of the Treasury that he will comply with the restriction aforesaid.

Mr. SMOOT. "Will comply with the restriction aforesaid"?

Mr. REED. I will make it "the provision aforesaid."

Then it would read on:

And he shall also take an oath faithfully to discharge the duties of his office.

Mr. SIMMONS. The effect of that would simply be to transpose the portion of the section which reads "before entering upon his duties each director shall," and so forth, and put it at the bottom of the paragraph.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to inquire whether the committee amendment on lines 3 and 4 has been agreed to? Let us try to proceed in order; that is all.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have already made that inquiry, and found that it has not been agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Does not the Senator think we would proceed more in order if we should adopt that amendment and then adopt the amendment of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. REED. It would just take that much more time. That question has been raised.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator's amendment comes subsequent to the committee amendment.

Mr. REED. But I ask to transpose it to the foot of the section.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is going to transpose it?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. I understand.

Mr. SIMMONS. I accept the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the first place, before the word "entering," in line 4, it is proposed to insert the word "Before," beginning a new sentence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment on lines 6 and 7 it is proposed to strike out the words "has complied with this requirement, and he shall also" and insert "will comply with the provision aforesaid, and he shall also."

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, what has been done with the remainder of the committee amendments to section 5? There has been a consultation going on on the other side, but I was unable to follow it. Only part of the committee amendment is disposed of by this last suggestion. Are we now perfecting the committee amendment?

Mr. LODGE. That is what is being done, as a matter of fact.

The SECRETARY. So that as amended the paragraph will read:

Before entering upon his duties, each director and officer shall certify under oath to the Secretary of the Treasury that he will comply with the provision aforesaid, and he shall also take an oath faithfully to discharge the duties of his office.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I am very sure the Senate does not want to adopt language of that kind, requiring that an officer shall certify that he will do something in the future. "Certify" means to swear to the truth of something that has already been decided, and a man can not certify that he will do something; all he can do is to take a solemn oath that he will do that. I think the language proposed is absolutely incorrect, although I may be mistaken.

Mr. REED. I think it is just as correct to certify that you will do a certain thing as to certify that you have done a certain thing. It is a mere matter of phraseology, but if the Senator prefers to substitute "make an affidavit," I have no objection to that being done.

Mr. HOLLIS. A man can not make affidavit that he will do something; all he can do is to swear that he will.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am perfectly willing to accept the term "certify," but if the appointee is to be required to make an oath to it I am not willing to accept it, and I do not think the Senate ought to ask any such thing of an appointee of the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri to the amendment of the committee. [Putting the question.] By the sound the ayes seem to have it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask for a division.

The question being put, on a division the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I should like to know what became of the amendment in lines 3 and 4?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not been dealt with.

Mr. LODGE. That is a perfectly natural inquiry. We are now, I understand, to agree to it and put it in another place. It is a wholly needless amendment in any event.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think that the amendment ought to be adopted, but I do not know what the connection is now.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I understand that the amendment in lines 3 and 4 has not yet been adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina is correct.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that that amendment be transposed and be placed in line 8 after the word "office," at the end of the sentence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert on page 5, line 8, after the word "office," the following:

Any director shall be subject to removal by the President of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not going to oppose the amendment, but I do not think there is any necessity whatever for it, because the President of the United States has that power now.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This amendment was put in the bill, I think, by the Finance Committee, because the new institution is to be a corporation, and, while we were disposed to believe that the appointees who will hold office under the corporation will occupy just the same position as any other officer of the Government, we desired to have no possible question about it, and as we were creating a separate entity, a corporation, we put in that provision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next committee amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over is on page 9, where the committee proposes to strike out—

(d) In exceptional cases, to make advances directly to any person, firm, corporation, or association whose operations shall be necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, for periods not exceeding five years from the respective dates of such advances, upon such terms, and upon the security of such bonds, notes, or other obligations, and subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the board of directors of the corporation, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. The corporation shall retain power to require additional collateral security at any time.

And insert:

(d) To make advances directly (1) to any corporation owning or controlling (directly or through stock ownership) any railroad or other public utility, and (2) to any firm, corporation, or association conducting an established and going business whose operations are necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war: Provided, That such advances shall be made only in such cases as the board of directors in their discretion shall determine to be of exceptional importance in the public interest. Such advances may be made for periods not exceeding five years from the passage of this act, upon such terms and upon such security and subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed from time to time by the board of directors of the corporation, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. The corporation shall have and retain power to require additional security from time to time.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, on page 9, line 16, after the word "advances," I move to amend the amendment reported by the committee by inserting the words "upon adequate security." That matter was brought up the other day in the Senate by the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], and I think it was agreed that it would be wise to put in some provision relating to the securities. Therefore I have offered the amendment for that purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not catch the lines where the amendment is to be inserted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, line 16, in the portion proposed to be inserted, after the word "advances," it is proposed to insert the words "upon adequate security," so as to read:

(d) To make advances, upon adequate security, directly—

And so forth.

Mr. TOWNSEND. To what does "such" refer? You have not mentioned and security before.

Mr. SMOOT. It refers to "advances"—"such advances."

Mr. TOWNSEND. You say, on page 10, line 3, "such security." Now, what security? Where have you mentioned security before?

Mr. SMOOT. I will call the Senator's attention to line 24, page 9, at the beginning of the sentence:

Such advances—

That is, the advances to be made to these corporations—

may be made for periods not exceeding five years from the passage of this act, upon such terms and upon such security—

It seems to me that if the Senator wants to use the word "adequate," it would be better to have it read "upon such adequate security" rather than to have it read "make advances upon adequate security."

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the word "such," in line 2, is qualified by "as," in line 3—

Such * * * as may be prescribed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. There can be no misunderstanding as to what is meant if the words are inserted where I have them in the bill. It seems to me that it makes it very clear, right on the start, that we are proposing that this board shall demand adequate security for the loan.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Michigan that it would be better English in the latter place, although the meaning would be the same.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the first suggestion of the Senator from Michigan, I think, was that it be put just in front of the word "security" on line 3, page 10. That was his own first suggestion.

Mr. TOWNSEND. No.

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] made that suggestion.

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; it was my suggestion that it go in where I have offered it, on line 16, page 9. If, however, it accomplishes the same result, I do not care; but it seems to me that to put it in at the very beginning makes it entirely clear, and I see nothing the matter with the English as suggested by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. The difference in the English is that when in the one case you insert the words "to make advances upon adequate security," and when afterwards you say "upon such security as may be prescribed," there is an apparent conflict of meaning of the terms; while if you introduce the word "adequate" in line 2——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I certainly should want to repeat the word over on page 3.

Mr. OWEN. If you repeat it, then it would not be necessary in the first place—if you make it read "upon such adequate security" on line 3.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the place to put it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That language seems to apply to the entire advances. I do not know how I got the idea that it was the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan, but I gathered it from what he said a day or two ago, and marked "adequate" in front of "security" on line 3, and thought it fully met the subject, and met it very handsomely.

Mr. SMOOT. The senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] gave notice last evening that he intended to propose two amendments to this paragraph, and stated what they were. One of them was to insert "adequate" before the word "security" on page 10, line 3.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; but several days ago the Senator from Michigan first called attention to the importance of using the word "adequate" in connection with the security; and while he was on his feet I wrote "adequate" in front of "security" at that place, and thought it came from him.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I did make the suggestion; but my suggestion when I first proposed it was that it be put in here, and I am still convinced that the proper place for those words is after the word "advances" on line 16, page 9, as I offered it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I shall not resist the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan. I do not think it necessary; I think we can safely trust the board to take adequate security; but it can do no harm.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] was called out of the Chamber, and he asked me to offer for him an amendment on page 10, at the beginning of line 3, to insert the word "adequate." I think the amendment just adopted makes that unnecessary, but I should like to have the views of the Senator from Georgia on that point.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to have it inserted in front, and there, too, because here we are dealing with their power to regulate and require security.

Mr. HOLLIS. There seems to be no objection; and I therefore move that the word "adequate" be inserted at the beginning of line 3, on page 10.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 3, before the word "security," it is proposed to insert the word "adequate."

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to that amendment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, another amendment to the committee amendment that the Senator from Colorado asked me to submit was this: On page 9, line 20, after the word "whose," insert "bonded indebtedness is not in excess of its actually invested capital, and whose," so that the amendment will read, beginning with part (2)— to any firm, corporation, or association conducting an established and going business whose bonded indebtedness is not in excess of its actually invested capital, and whose operations are necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war.

I am quite sure that the directors of this bank would not do that; but it certainly will do no harm to limit it to corporations that have at least invested as much capital in their business as they have outstanding obligations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, line 20, after the word "whose" and before the word "operations," it is proposed to insert "bonded indebtedness is not in excess of its actually invested capital, and whose."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if I understand that amendment, it means that if a street car line or a railroad or any other public-utility corporation has built the line of railroad, or the plant for furnishing gas or electric light, or is carrying on any other business that could be classed as a public utility, if any corporation has issued bonds for the purpose of building the plant or the road and has not issued as much stock and paid the actual cash for the stock into the company, then it could not receive any assistance under this paragraph. In other words, in order for a public-utility corporation to obtain assistance under paragraph (d) of section 6 of the bill, they must have paid in cash for their stock an amount equal to the bonds that have been issued and sold for the installation of the plant or the building of the road.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I do not understand that to be the effect of this amendment at all. This amendment, like the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan a few moments ago, is along the lines of the suggestion I made during the speech of the Senator from North Carolina in presenting this bill; and at that time I understood that provision would be made so that the corporations that had bond issues that represented more money than had actually gone into the corporation would not be entitled to the benefits of this act. We all know that there are a great many paper corporations, where the stock represents nothing and where the bonds very often do not represent much more than 40 or 50 or 60 or 70 per cent of the actual cash that comes into the treasury and is expended for the benefit of the corporation. But the point raised by the Senator from Utah is an entirely different thing. As I understood the amendment of the Senator from Colorado, as presented by the Senator from New Hampshire, it was that the actual money that is invested in the corporation's business must equal the amount of bonds. Now, it does not say that that must come from the proceeds of the sale of bonds. It may come from the proceeds of the sale of bonds and the sale of stock. If a corporation has outstanding an issue of a million dollars of bonds, before it could get the benefits of this act it would have to establish to the satisfaction of the directors of the corporation that a million dollars of the money had gone into the corporation, either from the sale of those bonds which are outstanding to the extent of a million dollars, or from the proceeds of the sale of those bonds plus such money as may have been paid in on the capital stock.

I will inquire of the Senator from New Hampshire if that is not the purpose of the amendment as he understands it?

Mr. HOLLIS. That is exactly my understanding of what it does mean.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that I had not seen the amendment and only heard it read once from the desk; but having secured a copy of the amendment and having read it in connection with the paragraph itself, the statement made just now by the Senator from Pennsylvania is correct, and I see no reason why the amendment should not be adopted.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to have the amendment stated.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I had not seen the amendment until this moment. I had in my mind the idea that the amendment was a little differently worded from this. I had in my mind the idea that it used only the word "capital," and I was afraid that that might not include surplus.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I should like to hear that amendment stated again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have in mind a great many industrial corporations whose surplus exceeds their original paid-in capital, and I was anxious that this amendment should include both the surplus and the original capital. I think it does. It reads:

whose bonded indebtedness is not in excess of its actually invested capital——

Mr. McCUMBER. What page and line?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is on page 9, line 20, after the word "whose."

Mr. McCUMBER. Now will the Senator read it again?

Mr. SIMMONS (reading)— whose bonded indebtedness is not in excess of its actually invested capital, and whose operations——

Mr. SMOOT. It does not say "surplus."

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, let me ask the chairman of the committee a question on that point. Suppose that here is a corporation manufacturing munitions of war. It has a million dollars invested in its plant. It has out bonds to the extent of a million dollars against that plant. Therefore it has no assets, so far as the value of its plant is concerned, in excess of the bonds against it. Suppose, however, that it has sold bonds for $50,000,000, and has the money in its treasury for the purpose of extending that plant to meet the demands of the Government. Now, it has its $50,000,000 and yet the Government could not give it any assistance unless it gave additional security. If the Government required $100,000,000, it could not take any other kind of security, though the corporation had additional security.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, there is another matter that I am wondering if I am right about. I mention it in order that I may be set right if I am wrong.

Suppose we have a corporation that has been in business a long time. Its original investment in capital was small, but that business has grown to great magnitude. Possibly it is not all due to additional capital. Possibly it is worth more in the market to-day, and would be worth more as security in the market, than is represented by its bonded indebtedness and original capital; and yet its bonded indebtedness is due and has to be refunded. As I understand, under the provisions of this amendment that corporation could not be loaned a greater amount than its bonded indebtedness at the present time, plus its capital originally invested. Now, might not occasion arise—I do not know; I am not clear about that—where relief might be desired, and desirable on the part of the Government, by a concern of that kind, which this amendment might cut off?

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment may be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, line 20, after the word "whose," it is proposed to insert the words "bonded indebtedness is not in excess of its actually invested capital, and whose."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it seems to me that that language is a little unfortunate. The actually invested capital might have been a million dollars. It might be all gone, or it might be nine-tenths gone, and yet it was invested. Its actually invested capital might be $100,000 and its actual property might be a million dollars, because the property may have increased vastly beyond the actual investment. It depends on the meaning you give to the term "invested." I think the Senator's idea is not a bad idea; but I think it would be better carried out if, instead of using the term "actually invested," he would say "its actual assets."

Mr. KNOX. Why not say "actually invested capital and assets"? I was just about to make that suggestion when the Senator rose.

Mr. REED. That would be better.

Mr. KNOX. That seems to obviate the objection made by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That would be all right.

Mr. KNOX. If the Senator will accept that, I think that will cover it.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I did not draft this amendment. I had no conversation at all with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] about it. He asked me if I would offer it. I have sent for him, and he can not leave the Military Affairs Committee, where he is presiding to-day. I think myself that "invested capital" means whatever real property has gone into the concern. I do not think there is any doubt about that; but if other Senators think it would make it plainer to say "actually invested capital and assets," I have no objection. I am not sure that the Senator from Colorado would agree to it, but I will take the responsibility of accepting that modification.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think it is very wise to use the word "assets." I am inclined to agree with the Senator from New Hampshire in his statement that assets would be covered by "actually invested capital," because if the corporation has accumulated something since its organization and since its original capital stock was converted into money and put into the corporation, that becomes a part of its actually invested capital; but I think it would be safer to put that in.

Mr. HOLLIS. Then I will modify the amendment by adding, after the word "capital," the words "and assets."

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I simply wish to suggest to the chairman that we are extending rather than limiting the credit to be given. When we adopted the amendment adding the word "adequate" it meant security which would absolutely protect the Government. Now you propose to allow the Government to make a loan upon security that has no equity beyond the loan. In other words, after making provision for adequate security, you have now changed the language so that you practically allow the Government to make a loan up to the extent of the value of the property and all assets; and that certainly is not adequate from any financial standpoint.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, it is not so much a question of what they put in as it is what it is worth. They might have put in twice as much as it is worth. It is adequate security that we want. It is something that will pay back the obligation. I agree with the Senator from North Dakota that we already have it stronger than the amendment would make it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; very much stronger than the amendment would make it.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has sent word that he would like to be here when this amendment is voted upon, and it is impossible for him to leave now. He has asked, therefore, that this committee amendment may go over until to-morrow. I understand the parliamentary situation to be that the pending amendment is subsection (d), and that if that is acted upon it will not afterwards be amendable. In order to save the rights of the Senator from Colorado, this whole committee amendment—that is, subsection (d)—would have to go over. I ask that for him.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that I am willing that it shall go over temporarily, but I should not like to consent that it go over until to-morrow. If it goes over temporarily, I do not think we will reach it again this afternoon; but if we get through everything else and this is all that is left, I would not wish to have the bill go over until to-morrow for that purpose. I will consent that it go over for the present.

Mr. HOLLIS. Does the Senator expect to pass the bill to-night?

Mr. SIMMONS. I hardly think we will; but——

Mr. HOLLIS. I hardly think the bill will be passed to-night. However, I am willing to take a temporary accommodation and run the risk of its possibly coming up later in the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over temporarily. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 10, line 12, after the word "its," to strike out "notes or obligations" and insert "bonds"; in line 14, after the word "such," to strike out "notes or obligations" and insert "bonds"; in line 18, after the words "of the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; in line 20, after the word "Such," to strike out "notes or obligations" and insert "bonds"; in line 22, after the words "of the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; in line 23, after the words "and the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; in line 24, after the word "Such," to strike out "notes or obligations" and insert "bonds"; on page 11, line 5, after the word "Such," to strike out "notes or obligations" and insert "bonds"; in line 11, after the word "such," to strike out "notes or obligations" and insert "bonds"; in line 18, after the words "by the," to strike out "notes or obligations" and insert "bonds"; in line 19, after the words "of the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation"; on page 12, line 9, after the words "by the," to strike out "notes or obligations" and insert "bonds"; and in line 10, after the words "of the," to strike out "corporation" and insert "Corporation," so as to make the clause read:

(f) To issue and have outstanding at any one time its bonds in an amount aggregating not more than eight times its paid-in capital, such bonds to mature not less than one year nor more than five years from the respective dates of issue, and to bear such rate or rates of interest and may be redeemable before maturity at the option of the Corporation as may be determined by the board of directors, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Such bonds shall have a first and paramount floating charge on all the assets of the Corporation, and the Corporation shall not at any time mortgage or pledge any of its assets. Such bonds may be issued at par in payment of any advances authorized by this act, or for any of the purposes of this act may be offered for sale publicly or to any individual, firm, association, or corporation at such price or prices as the board of directors may determine, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Such bonds may be dealt in by Federal reserve banks in the same manner and to the same extent as bonds or notes of the United States not bearing the circulation privilege, and Federal reserve banks shall be authorized, subject to the regulations of the Federal Reserve Board, to rediscount and purchase paper and make advances secured by such bonds in the same manner and to the same extent and at the same rates or at such higher rates as the Federal Reserve Board may approve, as they may purchase or rediscount paper or make advances secured by such bonds or notes of the United States under authority of the Federal reserve act. Any Federal reserve bank acquiring by purchase or rediscount such paper secured by the bonds of the Corporation may, with the approval of the Federal Reserve Board, use such paper so acquired for any purpose for which it is authorized to use paper secured by such bonds or notes of the United States: Provided, however, That whenever Federal reserve notes are issued against the security of such paper the Federal Reserve Board may make a special interest charge on such notes, which, in the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board, need not be applicable to other Federal reserve notes which may from time to time be issued and outstanding. All provisions of law not inconsistent herewith in respect to the purchase or rediscount by any Federal reserve bank of paper secured by such bonds or notes of the United States and in respect to Federal reserve notes issued against the security of such paper shall extend, in so far as applicable, to the purchase or rediscount of paper secured by the bonds of the Corporation and to the Federal reserve notes issued against the security of such paper.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, before we proceed any further I should like to refer back to the amendment on the top of page 5. I am informed that on account of the way the motion was put a different result appears on the record than was the intention of myself, and I know of the Senate, because we all understood it one way.

The amendment I am referring to is the one in which I proposed a substitute for the language appearing in the bill in these words:

Before entering upon his duties, each director and officer shall certify under oath to the Secretary of the Treasury that he will comply with the provisions aforesaid.

I was offering that as a substitute for the language of the bill; but when the Chair put the motion he put it as an amendment to the committee's proposed amendment, and as it appears in the record the committee's amendment was adopted, the committee's amendment being to strike out.

I therefore ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the committee's amendment to strike out the words "certify under oath to the Secretary of the Treasury that he has complied with this requirement, and shall also" was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. REED. Now, I ask that my motion be put in the form of a substitute; that is, that in lieu of the language contained in the bill beginning with the word "Before," in line 4, and extending to the word "also," in line 7, the following language shall be employed:

Before entering upon his duties, each director and officer shall certify under oath to the Secretary of the Treasury that he will comply with the provisions aforesaid, and he shall also——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I shall not call for the yeas and nays on that amendment, but I wish to give notice that when the bill comes before the Senate I am going to ask for a separate vote on that amendment and all the changes we have made in reference to that provision, and also the one commencing with the word "no," on line 25, page 4.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The next amendment passed over was, on page 13, line 1, after "SEC. 7," to strike out:

That for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, and providing for the public security and defense, through the restriction of unnecessary capital expenditures, the corporation may, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the corporation, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, investigate and license, or refuse to license, the sale, or offering for sale or for subscription, of securities, as hereinafter provided.

And insert:

That for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, and providing for the public security and defense, through the restriction of unnecessary capital expenditures, there shall be appointed by the Federal Reserve Board, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, a capital-issues committee, to consist of five members, of whom at least three shall be members of the Federal Reserve Board, which may, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by such committee, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, investigate and license, or refuse to license, the sale, or offering for sale or for subscription, of securities, as hereinafter provided. Such committee shall, however, grant licenses for any such sale, or any such offering for sale or for subscription, which it shall determine to be consistent with the foregoing purposes. The terms during which the several members of such committee shall respectively hold office shall be determined by the Federal Reserve Board, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the compensation of the several members of such committee who are not members of the Federal Reserve Board shall be $7,500 per annum, to be paid by the corporation.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I think there ought to be an appeal provided from the judgment of the capital-issues committee. Under the structure of the bill the board of the corporation handles the general business of the corporation, while three members of the Federal Reserve Board——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, would the Senator object to our taking an adjournment now and bringing up this matter in the morning? I understand that it is desired to have an executive session.

Mr. OWEN. No; not at all. I ask that my proposed substitute be printed in the RECORD, and I will bring it up to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that course will be taken.

The substitute is as follows:

Substitute for page 13, down to period on line 4 of page 14:

"That for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war and providing for the public security and defense through the restriction of unnecessary capital expenditures, the corporation may, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the corporation, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, by a committee of five experts, to be known as the 'capital issues committee,' investigate and license or refuse to license the sale or offer for sale or for subscription all securities as hereinafter provided.

"An appeal shall lie from such committee of experts to the Federal Reserve Board in cases where a license may be delayed or refused.

"All appeals shall be passed on within 30 days, or be held as granted. All decisions and appeals in refusing licenses shall be made in writing and be a public record.

"The members of the capital issues committee shall receive $7,500 per annum."

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me while I offer an amendment, not to be voted upon, but to lie upon the table? I should like to have it printed, if I may.

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. I offer the following amendment, to lie on the table: On page 8, line 11, after the word "deposits," insert the following: "or any building or loan associations."

Mr. OWEN. Before we go into executive session I wish also to give notice that I shall move to strike out section 11 of the bill to-morrow, on the ground that Congress ought not to abrogate its own authority to determine the validity and constitutionality of this act.

Mr. STERLING. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me for the purpose of offering an amendment?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. STERLING. I send to the desk an amendment to the bill, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered.

Mr. GORE. I wish to give notice that I shall move an amendment on page 15, line 7, after the word "any," to insert the words "State or by any."

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, March 2, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 1, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Rev. Dr. George F. Duncan, pastor Hermon Presbyterian Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Father of all, to whom can we come but unto Thee? Thou art our Creator, our Preserver, and our Redeemer. In Thee we live, move, and have our being. From Thee cometh down every good and perfect gift. May Thy name be hallowed in the session of this day. Give every one of these, Thy servants, a double portion of Thy spirit, leading them into all truth. May all that they do, say, and think be in harmony with Thy holy will, and so for the best good of our beloved land. Grant all these mercies with the forgiveness of all our sins, which we ask in the name of Jesus Christ, Thy Son, our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, the bill (H. R. 10296), authorizing the Post Office Department to acquire and extend the telephone system, and so forth, was introduced by Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky on the 27th day of this month. The bill is essentially the same as the one the House passed upon yesterday. I move to change the reference from the Committee on the District of Columbia to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Just a word, Mr. Speaker. The bill, in my judgment, should go to the Committee on the District of Columbia, but there is not enough difference between this bill and the one voted upon yesterday, and therefore I shall enter into no contest about the matter.

The question was taken, and the motion to rerefer was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. MAPES was granted leave of absence on account of death in his family.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. MASON, on account of sickness in his family.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by publishing in the RECORD a patriotic address delivered by Mr. JAMES, of Michigan, on Washington's Birthday.

The SPEAKER. Delivered by whom?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a patriotic address made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. JAMES]. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not expect to object, but did the gentleman make a similar request yesterday?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I did two days ago, and it was objected to by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Ohio rise?

Mr. FESS. To submit a request for unanimous consent that I be permitted to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an address delivered by my colleague L. W. FAIRFIELD, of Indiana, here in the city of Washington on Abraham Lincoln on the anniversary of his birth.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech made by Mr. FAIRFIELD, of Indiana, upon Lincoln, somewhere in town. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by having prinfed a letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue giving his ruling upon the question of the taxation of Congressmen's salaries.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. DOOLITTLE] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, explaining some features of the tax bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Reserving the right to object, is this letter directed to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does it hold that Congressmen's salaries are taxable?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have no objection, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. KITCHIN. Has the gentleman from Kansas any objection to putting in his remarks the Treasury decision on that subject, too?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That is included in the letter. It gives the ruling he has made in the body of the letter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FEDERAL CONTROL OF RAILROAD TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to renew the request I made yesterday for unanimous consent to insist on the House amendment to the Senate railroad bill and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the railroad bill, S. 3752, and insist on the House amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The SPEAKER announced the following conferees: Mr. SIMS, Mr. DOREMUS, and Mr. ESCH.

REPORT OF PNEUMATIC-TUBE SERVICE COMMISSION.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a report of the commission appointed to investigate the pneumatic-tube service, and ask that the same be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia presents the report of the Pneumatic-Tube Service Commission, and asks unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve the right to object so far as the request obtains to printing it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. There have been other reports on this same subject in former Congresses, but they were never printed in the RECORD. This report will be printed as a document and be available to everyone who wishes to obtain a copy. I can not see any especial need for printing this report in the RECORD.

Mr. BELL. I will say to the gentleman that the report is short, embodying only a few pages of typewritten matter, and I think it would be of interest to print this report in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for five days in which to prepare a minority report on this same matter. I am a member of the commission.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent for permission to file a minority report on the same subject within five legislative days. Is there objection? There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would like to make an inquiry as to my right to unanimous consent, apparently granted, but perhaps afterwards denied. Wednesday, February 27, as shown on page 2768, I asked unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the so-called alien-slacker bill. The Speaker asked:

Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Another gentleman then made a similar request, and objection was then made. The Speaker then said:

Does the gentleman object to the request of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON]?

To which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] replied that he objected to them all. To avoid a misunderstanding, I now renew the request, as of that date.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to print an extension of a speech in the RECORD on the alien-slacker bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The extension of the remarks already made.

The SPEAKER. An extension of the remarks already made. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

DR. GARFIELD AND THE FUEL ORDER.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] has leave to address the House for not more than 30 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, it is my purpose to discuss in the time allotted to me the recent fuel order, the reasons for it, and what it accomplished.

On the 17th day of January, acting under authority granted by the Congress, Dr. Harry A. Garfield, the Fuel Administrator, issued an order, effective the next day, limiting the operation of industries whose output was not essential for war purposes, providing for the closing of places of amusement, stores, office buildings, and so forth. The fuelless days covered five consecutive days, commencing with January 18. At the expiration of that time Monday of each week was designated as fuelless day, or heatless day, through the month of February and until the 25th day of March. The order has now been rescinded, and we have had eight fuelless days. A continuation of the order, however, is authorized in the New England States, subject to the decision of the local fuel administrators there. The time has come to examine into the reasons for the order and what has been accomplished by it.

OPPOSITION IN CONGRESS.

The promulgation of the order, on the 17th day of January, provoked bitter speeches in both Houses of the Congress. On this floor gentlemen with no facts at all in their possession proceeded to bitterly criticize the Fuel Administration. It was insisted that the extreme cold and the ice and the snow did not interfere with the loading or unloading of coal. One gentleman insisted that he came from the coldest corner of the United States and cold weather never interfered with the unloading of coal. Another gentleman insisted that the proper way to unload coal was simply to thaw out the cars with steam jets—the inference being that a competent administrator would have accomplished it in that way. Another gentleman with frenzied oratory declared that if this order was necessary we had lost the first battle in this war. It was insisted that declarations of this kind constituted constructive criticism. An ex-Attorney General of the United States, who signed his name as Attorney General of the United States in President Taft's Cabinet issued at once a statement saturated with partisanship, reaching a lower level in the matter of partisan criticism than has yet been reached. This effusion was entitled "The limit of forbearance passed." It appeared in a New York newspaper, and the conference committee on national preparedness, of which Henry A. Wisewood is chairman, had it reprinted and distributed widely throughout the country. This conference committee may have rendered some good service, but by distributing this particular article they have done their very best to give aid and comfort to the enemy. An organization claiming to be patriotic, which uses its funds for the distribution of a partisan document like this has certainly almost passed its period of usefulness as an instrument of patriotism. Speeches made in this House that day—none of them were made on the Democratic side—will not be dropped from airplanes inside the German lines, and this effusion from an ex-Attorney General of the United States, if it gets into Germany at all, will be sent there by German agencies and will splendidly encourage German armies in the present crisis.

DR. GARFIELD.

The impression created by the speeches here and by partisan newspapers throughout the country is that Dr. Garfield is a college president and nothing more—that he gets his information as to conditions by peering out upon the world from the alcoves of college libraries. A strong partisan attempt has been made to create the impression that Dr. Garfield is absolutely incompetent, that he knows nothing at all about coal or about business of any kind, and that the appointment of incompetent men is made by the President for the reason that he prefers to be surrounded by men of small caliber—that the President himself is an able Executive with a splendid vision, and that his weakness consists in the alleged fact that he surrounds himself with men who are not qualified for the discharge of the duties they perform.

No President of the United States from the time of George Washington has exercised better judgment in the selection of men to discharge important duties, and the success of his administration is to a very large extent due to the splendid judgment exercised at all times by the President in the selection of the men he has appointed for the discharge of important duties. The time has come for the people to get acquainted with Dr. Garfield. I knew him in the old college days when he was a student in the college in New England of which he is now President and when I was a student at another institution not far away, and I have had occasion to observe his career during the years that have passed since then. He is a college president; no man is better entitled to be called "doctor" than he. Four great colleges empowered to confer degrees have conferred upon him the honorary degree of doctor of laws. He is a member of all the learned societies. These facts, however, do not seem to appeal to the critics of this administration. The fact that he is an educated, cultured gentleman in the prime of life, with a carefully trained mind, is used by partisan critics as strong evidence of the fact that he is especially disqualified for the discharge of the duties of the important office he now holds.

Dr. Garfield is a lawyer, and a lawyer of marked ability. No man in the United States better understands the business of operating coal mines. In a section of Ohio 30 miles from railroads he developed a coal mine, having organized a company for that purpose—a particularly rich mine overlooked by coal operators for the reason that it was remote from railroads, but Dr. Garfield, after arranging for the development of the mine, with splendid executive ability organized a company and built a railroad 30 miles long, connecting up the mine he had developed with the great railroad systems of the country.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Not just now. Later on, if I have the time, I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Dr. Garfield organized the Cleveland Trust Co., at the present time one of the great trust companies of the country, and Cleveland capitalists and business men and wage earners had enough confidence in his business ability to deposit with his trust company $20,000,000 in cash; and this great company holds also $120,000,000 in securities. He built an office building, one of the most important in Cleveland, in which to house the trust company. This great trust company now has 15 branches. The business men of Cleveland, his neighbors and his friends, have so much confidence in his business ability that they elected him president of the Cleveland Chamber of Commerce, and he discharged the duties of that position with marked ability. He also acted as president of the Municipal Association of Cleveland.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. RAINEY. I will be glad to yield later on. I can not yield now. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

I have said enough about Dr. Garfield to call attention to his accomplishments along the lines of practical business affairs. I undertake to say that no man in the country can be found who can better discharge the duties of Fuel Administrator than Dr. Garfield, who has been made the subject of so much unreasonable criticism and partisan abuse. When Dr. Garfield issued an order shutting off the heat from stores and office buildings he shut off the heat from the office building he had built himself. He regulated the coal trade of a coal mine he had himself made possible over a railroad he had built himself. He made an order affecting the business men who had been his associates all his life. No man was better qualified than he to understand the necessity for the order and its effect.

THE FUEL-CONTROL ORGANIZATION BUILT UP BY DR. GARFIELD AND MR. P. B. NOYES.

Dr. Garfield selected as one of his assistants to become the Director of the Conservation Bureau of the Fuel Administrator's office Mr. P. B. Noyes, of New York. Mr. Noyes's duties also included the necessary limitation of industries. With reference to Mr. Noyes, I might state that he has been for 23 years the general manager of the Oneida Co. (Ltd.), which manufactures silverware and other things—one of the great manufacturing establishments of the country—and for the last eight years he has also been President of that company. The American Hardware Manufacturers' Association is one of our most important commercial organizations. This great organization had enough confidence in Mr. Noyes as a business man to elect him President, and he served in this position with distinction. He entered Dr. Garfield's office two or three weeks after the appointment of Dr. Garfield and has been with him ever since. An effort has been made to create the impression out through the country that these prominent business men are merely ordinary job seekers, holding the positions they hold on account of the salary and emoluments connected therewith. As a matter of fact neither Dr. Garfield nor Mr. Noyes draw any salary. They have tendered their services to the Government for nothing—or, rather, their compensation has been fixed at a dollar a year, and there is no provision of law by which they can ever hope to collect even the dollar. They are patriotic, conscientious gentlemen, anxious to serve their country. They have both given up their private business and the important positions they held and have made tremendous sacrifices and have come to Washington to serve their country without financial compensation. The heads of the various bureaus established by Dr. Garfield in his department are composed of distinguished citizens especially qualified for the duties they are called upon to perform. I undertake to say that in the history of this country no man has been subjected to such unreasonable and unreasoning criticism as Dr. Garfield, but during all this period of storm and stress he and his assistants in the great organization he has built up have been quietly proceeding, discharging their duties without making the slightest attempt to defend themselves personally against the shafts of unfair and unjust criticism hurled at them. This is one of the men who have been criticized as amateurs in business, as incompetent men. Dr. Garfield built up his organization, built it up from the ground. There were no precedents to follow.

Dr. Garfield surrounded himself with men who are not amateurs in the coal business; he brought down here Mr. Rembrandt Peale, one of the leading coal operators of the country; Mr. L. A. Sneed, a man who had been in the coal business from his youth up; Mr. John White, president of the United Mine Workers; Mr. William Diamond, another leader in the Mine Workers; Mr. H. D. Nims, an authority on trade law; and Prof. S. A. Taylor, a prominent mining engineer, together with Mr. Noyes, whom I have already mentioned.

I might describe also the splendid qualifications of this cabinet of experts, but I do not have the time to do so.

COAL PRODUCTION IN 1917.

We produced in 1900, 269,000,000 tons of coal, including both bituminous coal and anthracite coal. From that period until the calendar year 1917 the production of coal in the United States has increased about 17,000,000 tons per year, and the railroads have adjusted their transportation systems to an increase of about that much each year. During the calendar year 1917, however, our increase in the production of coal over prior years was 64,000,000 tons. As it usually happens, it was necessary to move the greater part of this during the latter half of the year. The production of coal is and must always be a question of transportation. A coal shortage in the ordinary acceptance of the term is as impossible in this country as a shortage of sand or of limestone rock. In our 7,000 coal mines we can always produce as much coal as can be transported over our railroads. In order to understand how much 64,000,000 tons of coal is I have made a computation. Coal cars vary in length from 32 feet to 41 feet. The average length of a coal car is 38 feet. Allowing 3 feet of space between each car, it would require three trains of cars extending across the continent from New York to San Francisco to contain 64,000,000 tons of coal. In addition to these three trains extending across the continent there would be still another train extending from New York to St. Louis. This was the extra coal burden the railroads were called upon to assume in 1917 and this was not the only burden the railroads were called upon to discharge. Our export trade had been speeded up from $2,000,000,000 in value in four years to $9,000,000,000. In 1917 we exported $9,000,000,000 worth of manufactured goods—more than three times as much as any nation ever exported before in the history of the world. It was necessary for railroads to carry these goods from the place of manufacture to the sea, and this of itself would be an unprecedented increase in the burdens upon the railroad systems of any country. In addition to all this, the increased prosperity of the country brought with it in 1916 and especially in 1917 an enormously increased home consumption of foodstuffs and manufactured goods to be transported on our railroads. This was the condition of affairs when Dr. Garfield assumed control of the coal situation of the country in August, 1917. When he assumed control the production of coal was at its lowest mark. During the week preceding his appointment we produced less coal in the United States than was produced during any week of the year 1916. He immediately, by appealing to the patriotism of coal operators and their employees, commenced to increase the production and the distribution of coal. From that time on the production of coal increased until it largely exceeded the production of 1916. On the 8th day of December winter commenced, and winter commenced just at the time when there was a tremendously increased production of war material and of supplies of all kinds needed by our troops in France. The number of men we were sending increased with each passing week. Our transportation system became clogged by our own enormous strength as a manufacturing Nation. Our production was abnormal and the railroads were feeling in December the destructive force of our abnormal production. Our transportation system was breaking down. By the middle of January our lines of communication with France were absolutely destroyed, but not by submarines. Every ship loaded with our khaki-clad soldiers was being safely convoyed through the danger zone. Every ship loaded with supplies was safely reaching its destination, but the abnormal production of the country, our enormous export trade, our unprecedented interstate traffic occasioned by increased consumption in the United States, the demands of factories, every one of them running with full strength every day in the week, and thousands of them running all night long with three shifts of men each 24 hours, demanding, as manufacturing energy of this kind would demand, a great increased supply of coal; all of this strain, absolutely without a precedent in the history of this or any other nation, clogged our transportation systems. We need an increase of 5,000 locomotives every year in order to meet the increased demands on us. We have not been getting half that many; we have been supplying locomotives to France and to Russia. One-half of the thousands of cars at railroad terminals and filling sidetracks were cars loaded with coal, and then there came, increasing our difficulties, the intense cold of the middle of last month and the snow and the ice which accompanied it. Chesapeake Bay, a great coal highway, was frozen up for the first time within the memory of men now living. Great battleships were used for the purpose of breaking the ice in New York Harbor. In the stockyards district of Chicago an army of men were at work clearing away the snow and the ice. Passenger trains came into Chicago 8 to 12 hours late covered with ice, each one of them drawn by three great locomotive engines. All over the country rails were breaking under heavy trains. In New York Harbor and at Norfolk 250 great merchant ships were awaiting coal in order to sail out into the seas bringing to our own troops and to our allies in the war zone necessary supplies. It was of most vital importance to coal these ships at once and start them on their journey. The entire story can not now be told. After the war is over it will be possible to give all the reasons for the coal order of January 17 last.

Under the stress of congressional criticism too much has already been disclosed with reference to the movement of troops and munitions across the Atlantic, and with reference to other matters which should have been kept from our enemies. When the whole story is told, as it will be told after the war, there will be gentlemen, now Members of this House, who would be glad to expunge from the RECORD if they could the speeches they made immediately after the promulgation of the coal order. A delay of five days was absolutely impossible and inadvisable from every standpoint. I can not discuss the matter along this line further. As far as I am concerned I never expect to be the vehicle through which information which ought to be kept secret reaches the enemy.

FALLING OFF IN MOVEMENT OF WAR MATERIAL.

On account of the clogging of our railroads, not only was the production and shipment of coal falling off by the middle of January, but the shipment of steel plates and steel bars so much needed for the great new fleet we are building had fallen off 50 per cent. It is impossible to build ships in our shipyards without steel plates and steel bars, but more alarming still was the falling off in the shipment of projectile steel, needed for the manufacture of munitions. This had fallen off by the middle of January 45 per cent.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. RAINEY. If I have the time I will yield later.

WHAT THE COAL CONSERVATION ORDER ACCOMPLISHED.

The relief brought about by the order was immediately apparent. Every ship ready to sail in our ports in less than one week after January 17 had been bunkered and had started on its journey across the seas. As the result of the coal order it has been possible to load and to coal, since January 17, 480 ships. These ships carried 2,000,000 tons of food and war supplies. Forty of them were loaded with food, 71 were loaded with coal, oil, and gasoline, and 369 of them were loaded with munitions. Nearly every one of them has safely reached its destination. These supplies so necessary for the winning of the war are being now distributed to our own armies and to the armies of our allies in the war zone of France. The movement of steel plates and steel bars, and projectile steel, has rapidly again become normal. Freight is reaching its destination. The situation is relieved. Our overburdened railroad systems are again functioning.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. I ask unanimous consent for 15 minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CONSERVATION ACTIVITIES AND PLANS OF THE UNITED STATES FUEL ADMINISTRATION.

Mr. RAINEY. It is an easy matter for an executive officer to take possession of a department in normal times which has been organized and in operation for a long period of time. A department of that kind will almost run itself. Dr. Garfield's task was to build up a department in an abnormal period. In the most wasteful nation in the world, unaccustomed to conservation of economies of any character, it was his task to reorganize the coal-distribution system of the country and to establish a system of coal conservation. In spite of our unprecedented increase in production of coal there is still a coal shortage of 50,000,000 tons. Obviously this shortage can be overcome in only two ways: First, by building immediately more coal cars and more engines. Ten thousand more engines would hardly equal the demand considered in connection with the other demands upon our railroads. The other way to meet the coal shortage is to conserve coal. Dr. Garfield and his able assistants have organized a campaign in that direction. The coal industry has always been in this country a disorganized business. The task which confronts him is greater than any task ever undertaken by an executive officer prior to our entry into this war, and at the present time no executive officer of this Government has undertaken greater or more important duties than the duties which Dr. Garfield is conscientiously and ably discharging. He is blazing his own trail as he goes along—there are no precedents to help him—not much information of value at his command, except the information he is collecting himself. He has started a campaign for conservation of coal in the homes of the land, where we consume 120,000,000 tons of coal each year. By conserving coal in the homes—firing the furnaces and stoves more carefully, saving a shovelful a day, and more than that—it is estimated we will be able to save 12,000,000 tons every year, and Dr. Garfield has perfected an organization to bring about this result. In 250,000 locomotives and stationary steam plants throughout the country we consume approximately 400,000,000 tons of coal. Under a competent engineer, an organization is being perfected to educate firemen of locomotives and in stationary steam plants in the use of coal, and it is estimated that in this way 40,000,000 tons of coal can be saved per year. Under another bureau a campaign to encourage the substitution of wood for coal is being carried on. About 1½ cords of wood are equal to 1 ton of coal. It is estimated that an increase in the consumption of wood of 10,000,000 cords can be accomplished this year, and this would save 6,000,000 tons of coal. By consolidating public utilities plants and using natural ice, in which it is estimated now 50,000,000 tons are consumed, it is expected that 3,500,000 tons can be saved. By prohibiting advertising signs and unnecessary out-of-door lighting, at least 500,000 tons can be saved. The daylight-saving bill, which is being advocated by Dr. Garfield, will save a million tons of coal a year. By a natural reduction of building material this year, it is estimated 6,000,000 tons can be saved. It has been proven by investigations made by Dr. Garfield's department that it takes three times as much power to start a loaded trolley car as it does to run it one block, and Dr. Garfield has perfected, for the use of the street railway systems of the country, a plan by which 1,500,000 tons of coal can be saved each year by skip-stops—that is, stopping every other block.

I have enumerated some of the plans now being worked out and developed by the various bureaus of Dr. Garfield's department for the conservation of coal, and I have called attention to plans which are now in the process of development and which when developed fully will conserve over 70,000,000 tons of coal. Other methods are being planned and developed. We can not in war time conserve too much coal.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. RANDALL. The breweries of the country are using 3,000,000 tons of coal a year. Does the gentleman know whether Dr. Garfield intends to try to save any of that?

Mr. RAINEY. I do not know.

Mr. LONDON. The product of the brewery supplies a certain kind of heat also, does it not?

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman may be able to qualify as an expert on that. I can not.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. BLAND. Does the gentleman regard the order and advice that emanated from the Fuel Department last summer to the effect that the people should not purchase their coal at that time, that the price would be lower, shows any special qualification on the part of the Fuel Administrator?

Mr. RAINEY. That is a part of the misinformation with which some Members of this House have loaded themselves, and that is a part of the misinformation which was disseminated yesterday on the floor of the Senate. The Fuel Administration never made such an order as that.

Mr. BLAND. Who did, in connection with the Fuel Administration?

Mr. RAINEY. Nobody on the part of the Fuel Administration ever made such an order as that.

Mr. BLAND. Or statement to that effect.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman who interrupts me might have done it.

Mr. BLAND. Oh, no; the gentleman knows better than that.

Mr. RAINEY. I do not know. I did not do it, but no such advice came from this great department of this Government, and no advice ever came from this department not to buy coal last fall. When this department was organized on the 22d day of last August the production of coal had reached during the previous week a lower mark than it had reached during any week in 1916, and by appealing to the patriotism of operators and their employees in this country the production of coal commenced immediately to increase until just a few days, a few weeks after the appointment of Dr. Garfield the production was again normal and proceeding along the 1916 lines.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. If Dr. Garfield issued no statement that people should not buy coal last summer, why did he not correct the statement that was accredited to him to that effect in practically every paper in the United States?

Mr. RAINEY. Oh, thousands of letters were written from Dr. Garfield's department. Every man who wrote to that department asking if they had better wait to buy their coal received a negative reply, thousands of them throughout this country.

Mr. LITTLE. How did it happen that none of them were ever printed in a newspaper, but that, on the contrary, the newspapers widely spread the statement that he told the people not to buy?

Mr. RAINEY. Because the newspapers of this country prefer to be sensational, and the way to be sensational is to misrepresent things.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. I live in the center of one of the greatest coal fields in the world. There has never been a moment since that order was issued nor for a long period before that that we could not have shipped out twice as much coal as we were doing, and we had it ready to ship if we had the cars in which to ship it.

Mr. RAINEY. Oh, there is no question about that.

Mr. LANGLEY. How did this fuel order conserve coal in a situation like that? It hurt us there without helping anybody, as it looks to me.

Mr. RAINEY. Oh, I can not yield any further. The gentleman has not been listening to me. He does not appreciate the fact that my argument is that the production of coal is absolutely a question of transportation, and I have been discussing the question of transportation here all the time.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman what the Official Bulletin had to say on this thing at that time?

Mr. RAINEY. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman does not know whether it was silent or whether it said something?

Mr. RAINEY. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman said that the exports increased from $2,000,000,000 to $9,000,000,000.

Mr. RAINEY. Yes; in four years.

Mr. LONDON. To what extent does the increase represent an increase in bulk?

Mr. RAINEY. I am unable to answer the gentleman's question.

I have attempted to call attention to the facts. The country ought to know what the facts are. In spite of violent criticism on this floor, the country is loyally responding to the demands of the present situation. Fortunately, the speeches made here have been absolutely without effect. While violent criticisms, unsustained by any facts, were being launched from this floor on the 17th day of January, telegrams of acquiescence in the order were being received by the President of the United States and by Dr. Garfield. While, on the other side of this House, Representatives from Northern States were denouncing the Coal Administrator, from the very heart of the South, from the great industrial city of Atlanta, Ga., there came to the Fuel Administrator a telegram announcing that the merchants and the manufacturers of Atlanta in a mass meeting held on that day had passed resolutions agreeing to abide strictly by the conservation order. This expression of loyalty and patriotism was the first to reach this Capital after the promulgation of the order, and then from cities and villages, from great banking institutions, from manufacturers throughout the land, there came floods of telegrams, all pledging full performance of the fuel order. The country was loyal—the order was observed—the results are apparent—the first battle has been won. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. LONDON. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the railroad bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks in the RECORD on the railroad bill.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman has that right anyway.

Mr. LONDON. I did extend my remarks as delivered on the floor, but I want to insert some historical data as a separate extension.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have not already gotten unanimous consent may have leave to extend their remarks on the alien slacker bill.

The SPEAKER. For how long?

Mr. BURNETT. For five legislative days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen be permitted to extend their remarks on the alien slacker bill for five legislative days. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

PENSIONS.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 10027) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio calls up the bill H. R. 10027 and asks unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10027) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10027) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RAINEY in the chair). The question is on the engrossement and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHERWOOD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HELVERING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on pension legislation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. GILLETT. Reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. MADDEN. Let the gentleman state on what subject he expects to extend his remarks.

Mr. HELVERING. I stated that it was on pension legislation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is the gentleman going to discuss politics?

Mr. HELVERING. Not at all.

Mr. LANGLEY. Then I have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The SPEAKER resumed the chair.

ENLISTED MEN DISCHARGED TO ACCEPT COMMISSIONS.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9903) to provide for restoration to their former grades of enlisted men discharged to accept commissions, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send the bill up to the desk and the Clerk will report it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman indicate the calendar number?

Mr. DENT. I will in a moment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9903) to provide for restoration to their former grades of enlisted men discharged to accept commissions, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. GILLETT. Let the whole bill be read. It is very short.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the Clerk indicate what the calendar number is?

The SPEAKER. It is No. 129 on the Union Calendar.

The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9903) to provide for restoration to their former grades of enlisted men discharged to accept commissions, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That any enlisted man of the Army of the United States who has heretofore been, or shall hereafter be, discharged to accept a commission in any component part of the Army of the United States, and who shall tender himself for enlistment within three months after the termination of his commissioned service, shall, subject to such examination for enlistment as is provided by law or regulation, be accepted and be restored to the grade held by him before being discharged to accept such commission; and in computing service for retirement and continuous-service pay he shall be credited with all time served with the forces of the United States, and his service shall be deemed continuous, notwithstanding the interruption thereof by the changes of status provided for herein.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think some explanation should be given by the chairman of the committee as to the purpose of this bill.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, at the last session of Congress a bill was passed which provided that an enlisted man in the Regular Army who accepted a commission in the National Guard could be reenlisted or restored to his position as an enlisted man after his temporary commission expired. This bill is intended to extend the provisions of that act so as to include any enlisted man who may take a commission in the National Army. There are men who have served for many years in the Army and have noncommissioned positions now such as sergeants and corporals. They do not wish to take a commission in any branch of the service if their length of service as an enlisted man in the Army should be impaired thereby.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DENT. Certainly.

Mr. DYER. Does the gentleman's bill also include those who are commissioned from the Regular Army, noncommissioned officers, and who desire to resign before the war is over?

Mr. DENT. The bill provides that they may be reenlisted in the Army and get the benefit of continuous service.

Mr. DYER. How long does the gentleman's bill state after the war is over they have to do that if they desire?

Mr. DENT. They have three months.

Mr. DYER. I know a number of noncommissioned officers of the Regular Army who have been commissioned in the National Army. It was called to my attention, for instance, some weeks ago that two men were commissioned—one as a lieutenant and one as a captain—and they stated to the commanding general there they desired to resign their commissions and return to their noncommissioned positions in the Regular Army, and they wanted to do it now.

Mr. DENT. There is nothing in this bill that will prevent that.

Mr. DYER. This will permit him to do it at this time?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. CRAGO. Is not the purpose of this bill to enable men of the Regular Army, corporals and sergeants, who accepted commissions in the National Guard organization for service on the border to be reinstated to their positions in the ranks of the Regular Army?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Was not that taken care of in the appropriation act of last year?

Mr. DENT. That was taken care of, and this extends the same idea.

Mr. MADDEN. This gives them the right to go back to their former status, then, any time within three months after they surrender their commissions for any cause—that is, if it is an honorable cause?

Mr. DENT. They do not lose any right by reason of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any enlisted man of the Army of the United States who has heretofore been, or shall hereafter be, discharged to accept a commission in any component part of the Army of the United States, and who shall tender himself for enlistment within three months after the termination of his commissioned service, shall, subject to such examination for enlistment as is provided by law or regulation, be accepted and be restored to the grade held by him before being discharged to accept such commission; and in computing service for retirement and continuous-service pay he shall be credited with all time served with the forces of the United States, and his service shall be deemed continuous, notwithstanding the interruption thereof by the changes of status provided for herein.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DENT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CONDEMNATION OF LAND FOR NITRATE PURPOSES.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8409) for condemnation of land for nitrate purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 8409, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8409) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the condemnation proceedings of land for military purposes," approved July 2, 1917, and for other purposes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill may be read.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I think we can save time. I shall object to its consideration at the present time.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman is going to object, that ends it. Has the gentleman from Alabama another bill?

APPOINTMENT OF OFFICERS OF PHILIPPINE SCOUTS, ETC.

Mr. DENT. I have. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill H. R. 9571, a bill providing for the appointment of officers of the Philippine Scouts as officers of the Philippine Militia.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9571) to authorize the appointment of officers of the Philippine Scouts as officers in the militia or other locally created armed forces of the Philippine Islands drafted into the service of the United States, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk had better read the whole bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That officers of the Philippine Scouts be, and they hereby are, made eligible to appointment as officers in the militia or other locally created armed forces in the Philippine Islands which have been or shall hereafter be drafted into the service of the United States; and any such officer of the Philippine Scouts so appointed as an officer in said drafted forces shall not thereby vacate his commission in the Philippine Scouts, and in case his commission in said Philippine Scouts shall terminate while holding a commission in said drafted forces as aforesaid, he shall thereupon be eligible to reappointment as an officer of said Philippine Scouts notwithstanding his retention of a commission in said drafted forces.

SEC. 2. That in computing period of service for any purpose officers of the Philippine Scouts shall be credited with all time served as commissioned officers in the drafted forces mentioned in section 1 of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have a brief statement from the gentleman in charge of the bill in regard to the necessity for this legislation.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, the House recently passed a bill authorizing the President to call into Federal service the Philippine Scouts and the Philippine Militia. At the time that that bill passed the House it was generally supposed—in fact, it was known by the War Department—that they would use these American officers of the Philippine Scouts in this new organization, but the Judge Advocate General ruled that the officers of the Philippine Scouts would not be eligible for appointment to office in the Philippine Militia, and this is done in order to correct the law and extend the provisions of the bill we have already passed.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman explain to the House the effect of the provision in the bill found on lines 8 and 9, to the effect that "an officer in said drafted forces shall not thereby"—that is, by his acceptance of the new commission—"vacate his position in the Philippine Scouts"?

Mr. DENT. I think that is perfectly plain.

Mr. MONDELL. Does that mean that there is for the time being a vacancy among the officers of the Philippine Scouts?

Mr. DENT. I so understand it. In other words, it is proposed to use this organization for war purposes, and then, when the war is over, of course the Philippine Scouts organization will be retained for peace purposes.

Mr. MONDELL. Has the effect of the legislation referred to been temporarily to disband, or will its effect be to temporarily disband, the Philippine Scouts?

Mr. DENT. I think so.

Mr. MONDELL. I assumed that was the case.

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Then I do not clearly understand the necessity of the officer retaining a commission in the Philippine Scouts.

Mr. DENT. Because when the war is over he will revert to his original commission as an officer of the Philippine Scouts. The organization will be temporarily disbanded during the war, for war purposes.

Mr. MONDELL. Of course, he would be eligible for a commission in the Philippine Scouts organization in that event, so that I do not quite understand the necessity of retaining the Philippine commission. In other words, it is the case of a man holding two commissions at the same time. That is what it really amounts to.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think its analogy is to be found now in the practice whereby an officer of the Regular Establishment will vacate that office temporarily, perhaps, to hold a higher grade and rank in the National Army, and at the conclusion of his tour of duty in the National Army will revert to his old status in the Regular Army.

Mr. MONDELL. Such an officer in that event does not retain his commission.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Of course he does, but he does not act under it. He holds his old place in the lineal list, his old grade and rank, unless under the automatic operation of the law he is advanced in numbers on the lineal list.

Mr. ALEXANDER. But he does not get pay under both.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. No; not under both commissions.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand that in such a case the officer's place was held open for him.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. He does not operate under that commission. A man may be put in temporarily to occupy a vacancy caused by his temporary advancement, but the man's old status in the Regular organization is preserved to him.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DENT. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Do I understand now that an officer in the Philippine Scouts who is drafted can not be commissioned as an officer in the Army?

Mr. DENT. Certainly he can be commissioned.

Mr. MONDELL. If he were drafted; but he can not be drafted?

Mr. DENT. No; he can not be drafted.

Mr. CANNON. I thought this was a proposal to take in the whole organization.

Mr. DENT. It does propose to take in the organization. We have already passed that bill. It is behind us. That has already been done. The question now is whether or not the Philippine Scout officers shall be eligible to appointment in this militia that we have called into the service.

Mr. CANNON. The Philippine Scouts having been drafted along with the whole shooting match he is not an officer—he is not an officer at all, not a commissioned officer?

Mr. DENT. No; he is not.

Mr. CANNON. And can not be under the law?

Mr. DENT. No; he can not be under the law.

Mr. CANNON. Is he eligible to appointment? Suppose the President should send his nomination to the Senate. Is he eligible to be an officer?

Mr. DENT. A Philippine Scout officer?

Mr. CANNON. No; an officer in the Regular Army. These people go into the Regular Army, do they not?

Mr. DENT. I really do not understand the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a second?

Mr. DENT. No. I would like to understand the position of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. What is the status of a Philippine Scout company or regiment that has been conscripted? What is the status of a man who was an officer in the Philippine Scouts? Is he now a private?

Mr. DENT. He occupies the status of a noncommissioned officer or private in the Regular Army.

Mr. CANNON. Then he loses his commission in the Philippine Scouts?

Mr. DENT. He does, or would but for the provisions of this bill. This bill takes care of that and protects it.

Mr. CANNON. Does it take care of it while he is in the Army, while the war lasts?

Mr. DENT. It provides that they may get back their commissions when the war ends.

Mr. CANNON. In the meantime he is not eligible for a commission?

Mr. DENT. Not in this organization unless this bill passes.

Mr. CANNON. I think there are officers in the Philippine Scouts who are perhaps Filipinos or half castes or Anglo-Saxons. Is that correct?

Mr. DENT. I think so.

Mr. CANNON. None of those, as I understand the gentleman, are eligible to appointment or commissions as officers in the Army?

Mr. MONDELL. Why not?

Mr. CANNON. I am seeking to find out. I am asking for information.

Mr. DENT. If you mean an appointment of the Filipino in the Regular Army, no. If he is an American citizen, he is eligible to appointment, provided he can stand the examination. A number of them have been tried out, and a number have been appointed, as I am informed.

Mr. CANNON. That answers my question.

Mr. MONDELL. Then the purpose of this is not primarily to make these men eligible to appointment in the new organization. They are now eligible to such appointment, are they not?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. The purpose of this legislation is to allow these officers to accept commissions in the new organization and retain at the same time the commissions in the old organization?

Mr. DENT. That is true, but to hold and only to exercise one of the commissions that they have.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman said in the beginning of his remarks that the purpose of it was to make it possible for these men to accept commissions in the new organization. That is not an accurate statement of the situation.

Mr. DENT. It is an accurate statement of the situation, because the new organization that I was referring to is the organization of the Philippine Militia and the Philippine Scouts, to be used during the war.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; but these men are eligible to commissions in that organization.

Mr. DENT. The judge advocate says not.

Mr. MONDELL. I understood the gentleman a moment ago to say that they were. They are citizens of the United States, are they not?

Mr. DENT. I said that any Philippine Scout officer who is an American citizen is eligible to appointment as an officer in the Regular Establishment, and the War Department has given these men an opportunity to stand an examination for that purpose, and a number of them have been appointed; but they are not eligible to appointment in this new organization combining the Philippine Militia and the Philippne Scouts, to be used during the war.

Mr. MONDELL. Why not?

Mr. DENT. Because the Judge Advocate General says so.

Mr. MONDELL. That is, the Judge Advocate General has said that they are not eligible for appointment in the new organization while retaining their commissions in the old.

Mr. DENT. Substantially that.

Mr. MONDELL. That is a very different proposition. I do not know that I have any objection to the legislation, but I think we ought clearly to understand its purpose; and its purpose is not to give these men an opportunity to accept commissions in the new organization, for they can do that in any event by resigning from the scouts, but to give them an opportunity to accept commissions in the new organization and retain commissions in the old.

Mr. DENT. I think I have stated that officers of the scouts can not under the ruling of the Judge Advocate General accept a commission in the organization of the scouts and Philippine Militia recently called into service under a bill passed at this session for that purpose. This bill is intended to correct this defect in that bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

ARMY CHAPLAINS.

Mr. DENT. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2917) authorizing the appointment of chaplains in the Army, one for each 1,200 men.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, I want to say to the gentleman that, while I am not opposed to this bill, at the same time, if it is going to take as great a length of time as was taken by the preceding bill, I shall feel constrained to object, because I wish to begin the consideration of the legislative bill.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. DYER. As far as I can find out, I am sure that there is no disposition to take time on this bill, and I think it very important. There is a great demand for it, and I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] will give me his assurance that if it is going to take any very great length of time he will withdraw his request, I shall not object.

Mr. DENT. I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill, and if any opposition develops I will withdraw my request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBBINS. Reserving the right to object, let the bill be read.

Mr. COX. I am going to demand the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. COX. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is not the mere demand for the regular order under the precedents of the House equivalent to an objection?

The SPEAKER. No; it has not been construed that way.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the Speaker will pardon me, it has been construed that way——

The SPEAKER. Ordinarily that would be the case, but in the matter of getting consent for the consideration of bills the Chair is going to construe it the other way. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. For the time being, if we can not have the bill reported, I shall be constrained to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can have the bill reported. The Clerk will read it.

The Clerk read the bill (S. 2917) to amend section 15 of the act approved June 3, 1916, entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," as amended by the act approved May 12, 1917, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes," as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 15 of the act approved June 3, 1916, entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," as amended by the act approved May 12, 1917, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 15. Chaplains: The President is authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, chaplains in the Army at the rate of not to exceed, including chaplains now in the service, 1 for each 1,200 officers and men in all branches of the Military Establishment, with rank, pay, and allowances as now authorized by law: Provided, That there shall be assigned at least one chaplain for each regiment of Cavalry, Infantry, Field Artillery, and Engineers."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think this bill would provoke some discussion, and I ask the gentleman from Alabama to withdraw it.

Mr. DENT. I made the promise that if there was opposition to it I would withdraw my request; but I would like to make this statement first, that this is recommended by Gen. Pershing himself in a special cablegram to the War Department, and the Secretary of War has urged the passage of this bill. With that statement, in view of the objection I will withdraw my request.

Mr. DYER. There is great demand in the country for the passage of this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. For the time being, I object.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES, FORMER COLVILLE INDIAN RESERVATION, WASH.

Mr. DILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table S. J. Res. 92, providing additional time for the payment of purchase money under homestead entries within the former Colville Indian Reservation, Wash.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to extend for a period of one year the time for the payment of any annual installment due, or hereafter to become due, on the purchase price for lands sold under the act of Congress approved March 22, 1906 (34 Stats., p. 80), entitled "An act to authorize the sale and disposition of surplus or unallotted lands of the diminished Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, and for other purposes," and any payment so extended may annually thereafter be extended for a period of one year in the same manner: Provided, That the last payment and all other payments must be made within a period not exceeding one year after the last payment becomes due, by the terms of the act under which the entry was made: Provided further, That any and all payments must be made when due, unless the entryman applies for an extension and pays interest for one year in advance at 4 per cent per annum upon the amount due as herein provided, and patent shall be withheld until full and final payment of the purchase price is made in accordance with the provisions hereof: And provided further, That failure to make any payment that may be due, unless the same be extended, or to make any extended payment at or before the time to which such payment has been extended, as herein provided, shall forfeit the entry, and the same shall be canceled, and any and all payments theretofore made shall be forfeited.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand that the gentleman intends, if consent is given, to offer some amendments, so as to grant this privilege to these homesteaders merely for one year and no longer, and also to increase the rate of interest from 4 per cent to 5 per cent.

Mr. DILL. Yes; I will say that a similar bill is on the Union Calendar, reported by the Committee on the Public Lands, which contains these changes that the gentleman suggests, and if he will offer the amendments, I shall have no objection to them. I have not prepared the amendments. The gentleman can offer them, or if he will give them to me I will offer them.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. DILL. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I understand that there is some legislation on behalf of the men engaged in military service who have made entries, extending their time and giving them some measure of relief. Why should this relief be extended indiscriminately?

Mr. DILL. This applies only to homesteaders who went on the Colville Reservation last year; probably only about 500 purchased land at the appraised value. It is dry land, and last year was a very dry year anyhow. Anybody who knows anything about the conditions there knows that the first year on dry land they have great difficulty in raising crops, and last year they scarcely got their seed.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Where is this land?

Mr. DILL. It is in eastern Washington, in the dry section between the Cascades and the Rockies. This will mean that these homesteaders can remain on the homestead and pay interest on the deferred payments to the Indians.

Mr. FOSTER. This only extends the time?

Mr. DILL. It extends the time of payment one year.

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill in its present form would extend the time to one year and would grant the entryman the right to have it continued indefinitely until one year after the last payment upon merely paying interest of 4 per cent. I understand the gentleman will offer amendments to grant it for one year only on a payment of interest at 5 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. This raises the rate of interest from 4 to 5 per cent?

Mr. STAFFORD. The House bill carried a rate of 5 per cent and the Senate bill a rate of 4 per cent. The customary rate in extensions of this character is 5 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. The regular rate that they pay on deferred payments is 5 per cent?

Mr. DILL. Five per cent.

Mr. MONDELL. What is the rate of the annual payment?

Mr. DILL. It depends on the appraisement of the tract upon which the man enters.

Mr. MONDELL. What is the average?

Mr. DILL. I am not sure about the average, but not a large amount.

Mr. MONDELL. Payment per annum?

Mr. DILL. Yes; but I am not certain about the amount.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mow many deferred payments are there?

Mr. DILL. This year's payments are due—probably three or four hundred of them, at the most. There will be other payments due next year. They can postpone those for one ear. It simply permits the homesteader to postpone each of his payments one year.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. It extends the time of making the payments one year?

Mr. DILL. Yes; and he pays interest of 5 per cent to the Indians for the use of the money. These Indians have a large sum in the Treasury and are not in need of the money.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DILL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "of" insert the words "not longer than"; page 1, lines 11, 12, and 13, strike out the words "and any payment so extended may annually thereafter be extended for a period of one year in the same manner"; page 2, line 2, strike out the word "last"; page 2, line 6, strike out the word "four" and insert the word "five"; page 2, lines 11, 12, and 13, strike out the words "or to make any extended payment at or before the time to which such payment has been extended."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DILL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The House bill (H. R. 5673) of similar tenor was laid on the table.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10358, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10358, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, pending that I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] whether we can not agree on time for general debate?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, it is now nearly 2 o'clock. I have requests from a number of gentlemen on this side amounting to more than three hours. I would suggest to the gentleman that no limit of time be placed on general debate to-day, but that we go into Committee of the Whole and have the time equally divided between the gentleman and myself and see what the condition will be at the conclusion of to-day's session.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think we can close general debate to-day?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not if all the gentlemen on this side demand their time. It will be impossible, but some gentlemen might not claim the time.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be equally divided, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] and the other half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee, pending his motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, asks unanimous consent that one half of the time for general debate be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] and the other half by himself. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia in the chair.

The Clerk reported the bill by title.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill which provides for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, carries a much larger sum than has ever been carried heretofore in a bill of this character. It is not necessary for me to say that this fact grows out of the greatly increased appropriations that have become necessary for clerks and other purposes in the departments here in Washington on account of the pending war, and if Members will examine the report submitted by the committee they will find that the great proportion of the increase in this bill over the current law is largely in two or three of the departments of the Government which are more intimately charged with the carrying on of the war. I refer to the War Department, the Navy Department, the Department of the Treasury, the Department of State, and the Bureau of Standards in the Department of Commerce. The estimates upon which this bill is based call for $75,694,852.09. The bill as reported to the House actually carries $69,533,598.25, or $6,161,253.84 less than the estimates submitted by the various departments. The appropriations made for the current year for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses amount to $55,951,799.17, or $13,581,799.08 less than the amount carried in this bill. The pending bill provides for 17,878 specific salaries, or 1,216 more than are carried for the present year, and 1,105 less than asked for in the estimates.

Unless it is particularly desired at this time, I shall not undertake to discuss the various items in the bill and the various cuts which have been made by the committee in the estimates, preferring to leave discussion of those particular matters until the bill is taken up in due course of consideration under the five-minute rule. But I will say that the Committee on Appropriations believe confidently that there has been no cut made in any of the estimates submitted to the committee and to Congress which will result in detriment to the Government. The committee feels confident that it has provided every dollar necessary for the efficient administration of the Government and provided every sum which will be required for the use of these departments, at least for the greater portion of the year. Certainly, every sum has been provided which can now be anticipated. I do not mean to say that there is not a possibility that in the future some of the departments, to wit, the War Department and the Navy Department, may not require an additional sum for clerical assistance if the war should continue indefinitely. It has been impossible for the heads of those departments and the heads of the various bureaus in those departments to state with any degree of certainty exactly how much clerical assistance they will need during the coming fiscal year, and especially so far in advance. Gentlemen will remember that there is no past experience to guide them and to serve as a criterion for the future. It is evident, however, to anyone who will read the hearings on this bill that it carries a sufficient amount of money to carry those departments possibly for the entire fiscal year, and certainly well into the fiscal year, and if this war should continue and the necessity should become apparent during the next fiscal year for additional money, Congress will be in session in December, and the heads of these departments will then be able to go before the committee and Congress and explain with greater certainty exactly what they will need.

I may say that the committee has allowed every dollar that was asked for in the estimates submitted by the War Department. We have not cut the original estimates submitted by the War Department one single cent. I believe that it is better to appropriate many dollars more than may be needed in this crisis than to fail to appropriate one dollar necessary to the running of the Government during this crisis, if by so doing it would result in either prolonging the war or in a failure to bring about a favorable and successful peace, and the permanent establishment of those principles of freedom and democracy for which we are contending. The country expects Congress to appropriate every dollar that is absolutely necessary for the prompt winning of the war, and it likewise expects the executive departments to spend the money so appropriated wisely and economically, and it will hold both Congress and the executive departments strictly to account for the proper exercise of the functions vested in them. The committee has held long and extended hearings, covering a period of nearly two months. As I have stated, it has been a human impossibility for the committee to determine just how much will be needed in some departments during the fiscal year, but I repeat that we have allowed every sum which we thought and believed from the hearings to be necessary. It is the duty of Congress, of course, to keep close track of these appropriations, immense as they are, which are being made from time to time. The Committee on Appropriations is not charged with the especial duty of investigating how money has been expended, nevertheless in its investigations and its hearings to determine how much money will be needed in the future it never fails to examine particularly how the money carried in a particular bill has been expended during the past.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. SNOOK. Has the gentleman any information or any figures as to how large an extent the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance is being extended? How many clerks have they there now?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The Bureau of War-Risk Insurance at the present time, or nearly a month ago, had about 1,780 clerks in round numbers. This bill carries an appropriation which will authorize an organization consisting of about 2,900 clerks, and I may say that the deficiency bill which was passed some weeks ago by the House carries a similar appropriation for the remainder of this fiscal year.

Mr. SNOOK. At how much cost for the year?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Three million five hundred and ninety-one thousand dollars.

Mr. SNOOK. That is not the total estimated expense of that bureau for the year, is it?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is not the total estimated expense for that bureau for the next fiscal year. I will say to the gentleman that that bureau's estimated expense was $3,897,848.

Mr. SNOOK. It costs a little less than $4,000,000 a year?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The committee has allowed $3,591,000, and I may say that the committee went very fully into the organization of the War-Risk Insurance Bureau and allowed them for salaries alone the sum of $3,000,000.

The cuts are principally in the matter of rent, stationery, and contingent expenses.

Mr. SNOOK. It will take something like 2,900 clerks when fully organized?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes. Now, Mr. Chairman, while the Committee on Appropriations have always conducted exhaustive hearings, not only as to the requirements of the Government in the future but as to the manner of expenditures of those sums which have been recommended in the first instance by the Appropriations Committee to the House, nevertheless there is a distinct duty and a great public service which the committees on expenditures of this House can render. I know of no more valuable service that can be rendered by any committee of this House than by the committees on expenditures in the departments at this particular time, especially since we are appropriating money no longer in the millions but in the billions. This bill does not carry at this time any general increase of salaries for the clerks, but I may say that the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations is now conducting hearings and considering an amendment, which will probably be offered to this bill before it is finally passed, making provision for some general increase in the compensation of clerks. The bill increases very few salaries of the larger class. There is but little legislation in this bill. It does carry a provision which places the Members' clerks upon the roll and provides that they shall be paid directly out of the Treasury rather than under the present custom. It further carries a provision, in accordance with the report made by the Bureau of Efficiency, discontinuing the nine Subtreasuries six months after the war ends. I shall not undertake to present the reasons for that proposed legislation at this time, because I am aware when it is reached in the consideration of the bill it will come up for general discussion.

Mr. LONERGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will yield.

Mr. LONERGAN. I call the gentleman's attention to lines 25 and 26, page 20, of the bill. Now the provision is "that the employment of any clerk or clerks," referring to the clerks of Members of the House, "hereunder shall cease upon the death, resignation, removal, or termination of service of the Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner by whom they were appointed."

Did the gentleman's committee take into consideration the advisability of continuing in the service the clerks of deceased Members of the House, or those who resigned during the period, and there was a vacancy, so that the business of constituents could be taken care of during the interval?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman we did not. This provision to which the gentleman has referred simply provides that clerks of Members will go upon the roll and be paid directly out of the Treasury by virtue of the appointment of the Member. Now, when a Member ceases to be a Member of this body, either by resignation, death, or otherwise, why the committee felt that the appointee holding his position upon the roll as the result of appointment should, of course, have his connection with the Government severed.

Mr. LONERGAN. Is the gentleman prepared to express an opinion as to the advisability of giving this consideration?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not really see, I will say to the gentleman from Connecticut, any material necessity for such a provision as the one to which the gentleman refers. We have no such provision now and it has been my observation that vacancies do not exist in the House for many months. Elections are usually called speedily by governors in the States where vacancies exist and the people fill those vacancies.

Mr. LONERGAN. There is a vacancy in the State of Illinois and has been for a good many months.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And that district has now no representation here either by a Member of Congress or by a clerk of a former Member, so this provision does not make any change in the existing law in so far as the holding over of clerks to Members is concerned.

Mr. LONERGAN. To whom does one write from a congressional district where there is a vacancy in the House of Representatives; to whom do we write to have public business transacted?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I know of no one to whom to write except the Senators or some Member living in an adjoining district.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In this particular instance, this State has two Congressmen at large.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. So they are well represented, as we all know, in the State of Illinois.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will yield.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Upon what theory does the committee recommend the placing of clerks to Members upon the roll?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Upon this theory, I will say to my colleague from Tennessee: This money which is appropriated from year to year is appropriated not to the Member individually but for the purpose of providing clerical services for the Member. Now I for one have never been able to see why the money so provided, appropriated as it is specifically for clerical service, should be paid to the Member and charged up to him upon the books of the Government as a part of his salary rather than paid directly to the clerks. The gentleman knows that under the recent ruling of the Internal-Revenue Commission on the war-tax law, which was passed last year, it is necessary for Members of Congress to report as a part of their salary the $2,000 which is now allowed them for clerical service. Of course we have the right to deduct——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. A Member takes credit.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. We have the right to deduct from that sum the same amount which has been paid for clerical services. Now, I have never been able to understand why there should be any objection to placing these clerks upon the roll, subject to the will of the Member, to be removed at any time that he may desire, and to have Government checks sent direct to those clerks rather than to the Member of Congress to be indorsed by him or cashed by him and then paid over to the clerk. It is an unnecessary bother and trouble and one that personally I would be very glad to rid myself of.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, if the gentleman will permit, it seems to me that there is a possibility that the provision of the bill carries the implication that Members have diverted funds from the purpose for which the law provided them.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, if there is any such implication it will have to be read in the bill by those who so construe it, because the committee has made no such implication, and it is not for that reason that they are proposing this amendment of the existing law.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Under the law as it now stands a Member must file in the Clerk's office the names of those whom he employs as clerks.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is the law. I do not know whether it is strictly observed or not. I do not think it is material as to whether or not it is observed, because I do not see any special benefit in that particular law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If the gentleman will permit, the Clerk of the House calls for the names of these clerks and keeps a record of them.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Under the law each Member must file with the Clerk of the House, if the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] will permit, the names of those whom he pays this clerical salary.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I wish the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] would keep his feet for a moment I think he is quite right as to the suggestion of the implication which he did not want to set out in detail. I read in one of the newspapers this morning a justification for that statement, in that the purpose of this change in the appropriation bill was said to be intended to correct certain abuses charged up to Members of Congress. Now, that is very cheap talk. But it is the kind of talk that holds in certain districts and weighs against Members of Congress. It seems to me the provision that has been written here is susceptible of very great injustice to Members of the House, in this, that some Members of the House employ one, two, three, or more clerks, and they can not pay them all $2,000 a year.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will read this provision very closely he will find ample provision has been made for just that sort of a situation. It is abundantly protected in this provision.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I question whether the gentleman gets the point. A Member may have one working for him whom he designates as his secretary, but he may have to employ one, two, three, or more, who receive, in the aggregate, $2,000 or more, the extra amount coming out of his own pocket. There are Members here who pay much more than that for the services of a secretary. Some secretaries may be excellent executives, without the capacity to typewrite or take dictation. In such cases the employment of a stenographer or a typist is necessary. Many Members of Congress are compelled to employ at a certain season of the year a number of persons to facilitate the distribution of documents and seeds, as the gentleman perhaps is well aware, and that is all extra money out of the salary of the Congressman, unless he can keep within the $2,000. The newspaper statements conveying the implication referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] may be very unfair to Members of the House.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Any statement which may have been published in the papers this morning or at any other time, I am sure has not emanated from any member of the Committee on Appropriations, either the full committee or the subcommittee. And I wish to assure the gentleman that the committee in recommending this provision to the House has not done so with any such idea.

Now, I hope that Members will not be unduly sensitive about some implication that may arise if we enact a provision of this kind. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has already said that in a number of the States and throughout the country, in many papers, insinuations are constantly being made. More than that, we all know that in some cases general charges have been made that some Members of Congress are not using all of this fund for the purposes for which it is appropriated. I do not subscribe to that any more than the gentleman from Pennsylvania subscribes to it. I resent it, but the gentleman will recall that last year, in another end of this Capitol there was quite a discussion in which many references were made by distinguished gentlemen representing important States in this Union, along the same general lines. The clerks of the Senators are on the roll. They are paid directly out of the Treasury. They get their checks from the Treasury, and no Senator is charged with the receipt of any money for clerk hire, nor is it considered a part of his salary, nor does he have to make a return of that amount as a part of his salary when he undertakes to make his return for income taxes.

Now why, gentlemen, in all reason and in all fairness should we object to placing our clerks upon the same plane as the clerks of the Senators and permit them to be paid out of the Treasury the sums to which they are entitled?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to say to the gentleman that I know of one Senator who has—but, of course, it is forbidden to discuss this matter in the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If the gentleman will permit, I do not think we should start the discussion of it at all.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It was not my wish to discuss the matter now. I preferred to wait until we reached that provision in the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I mean the discussion of the employment of clerks in any way they please at the other end of the Capitol. I will be compelled to make a point or order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will ask the gentleman if a Member of Congress ought not to have authority over his own office—authority to dismiss a clerk at will?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will read this bill, he will find specific and absolute authority is given to a Member to dismiss the clerk at will at any time in the day or month. And he will find, further, that this provision is so drawn as to permit a Member of Congress to employ a clerk one month at $100 and permit the extra $66.66 to accumulate for several months, if he desires, and then to put on four or five, if he should need them, at any time that he may choose, so long as their salaries do not exceed the amount allowed. In other words, it is drawn in such a way that it can not hamper any Member in the conduct of his office and the employment of clerical assistants. That is the intention of the provision, and I believe it is drawn so as to cover it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman makes a point of the difference between the appropriation for clerks in this body and appropriations for clerks in the other body. This bill provides appropriations for both sets of clerks.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Precisely.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And the gentleman knows perhaps of his own knowledge of Members of Congress and Members of the other body as well who employ more clerks and pay much more money for those clerks than the $2,000 allowed.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes. I am in that class myself, and have been ever since I have been a Member of this body.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have been obliged to employ more than one.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There has been no time when I have not had two permanent clerks in my office of a high order of ability.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And the gentleman ought to have the right to dismiss either of them.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; and if I thought that this provision would interfere with me in the conduct of the affairs of my office, I would not stand for it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Not now. But I am quite sure that the provision will not interfere in the least.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Just for information. I confess that I have not read the bill. What would be done in a case like this, and I think that it has happened to many Members: Suppose a Member's secretary or clerk had entered the military service, had either been drafted or had enlisted. After his departure some time must necessarily elapse, perhaps, before the Member can find a suitable clerk to replace him. What will the Member do in that case, and what will become of the salary?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. You mean during such time he will not have the services of a clerk?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Yes. In that case, you see, considerable time might elapse before the Member could find a suitable clerk, and he might be obliged to shift from one to another. He might be obliged to employ one or two or three, or he might not be able for a time to get anybody who was satisfactory. How would you manage?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It is permitted by this clause that the money that is withheld and not paid can be paid to the new clerk.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Suppose a person taken on is not competent to perform the full duties of a clerk, and is taken on temporarily. How would you manage under the provisions of the bill in a case like that?

Mr BYRNS of Tennessee. The provision recommended by the committee does not present the slightest difficulty in a situation of that sort, because it provides that the Member may place any person he pleases upon the roll as his clerk, at any salary that he desires, and whenever he desires to dispense with the services of such person all he has to do is to notify the Clerk of the House that he has done so and the name will be stricken from the roll.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. But if you have to formally employ him you must formally discharge him.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman speaks of the formality as something requiring a great deal of time and attention. A mere telephone message or a mere letter would be sufficient.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And a little backbone.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. A mere message or letter to the chief clerk would serve to discharge the clerk.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The gentleman says so, but after all he recognizes that there is difficulty in that sort of thing?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No more difficulty now than if the gentleman unfortunately at some time in the future, during the many years that he will continue to faithfully serve the people in Congress, as I hope he will—if in the future he happens to have a clerk whose services he feels it necessary to dispense with, I am sure the gentleman would promptly take proper action.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. While I have been here I have had but two clerks.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman is fortunate.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I think it will meet this condition that exists with a good many Congressmen. They employ a secretary to whom they pay, say, $1,500 a year. Now, in order to do the work of the office during rush times they are required from time to time, sometimes for only a few days, and sometimes for perhaps two or three weeks, to have additional help. I will say that that occurs 8 or 10 times during the year. Would the provision meet such an arrangement as that?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Precisely; and it is drawn exactly to meet just that condition of affairs. I will say to the gentleman that under this provision a Member does not have to employ even one clerk for any particular month in the year. If he feels that during a certain month he can dispense with clerical service, he can do so, and the sum which has been appropriated for that particular month will accumulate, and if in the next month he needs to take it up by the employment of an additional number of clerks he can do so. In other words, there is no limitation, so far as the number is concerned, in the number of clerks he can employ or when he shall employ them, the only limitation which does obtain being that the total amount paid in a year shall not exceed $2,000.

Mr. TOWNER. Let me see if I understand the gentleman. We will say that a Member has a permanent clerk. He goes on all the time. Of course, that is easily arranged. That would be the secretary, probably. Now, a Member wants to employ additional help or two or three additional employees in his office. He would be required, would he not, to send over a statement that these persons were to be employed and were to be placed upon the list, upon the roll, and then they would be required to make out a statement of what was paid to them, and if the total did not exceed $2,000 they would be allowed that? Is that right?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the total amount did not exceed $2,000 for the entire year, he would be allowed that. But it is proper to state that a Member under this provision would not be permitted to anticipate the expenditure of the $2,000. In other words, he could not spend during six months, say, more than $1,000 for clerical help.

Mr. TOWNER. I understand that; but the idea would be, as I understand it, according to the provision, that every time you employ a temporary clerk or assistant in the office you would have to send over the name, and they would have to receive their pay——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Through the Clerk of the House.

Mr. TOWNER. Through the Clerk of the House.

Mr. BORLAND. I want to reply to the gentleman from Iowa. I heard the gentleman from Tennessee a few moments ago state that if a Member dispensed with his clerk for 30 days the money that would have been paid to that clerk would accumulate to the credit of the Member and could later be paid to some other clerk for additional services. I do not understand that provision in that way, and do not read it in that way. The provision reads:

> That each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner may appoint for such periods and at such rates of compensation as he shall determine within the said sum of $2,000 a clerk or clerks, who shall be subject to be removed at the will of the person by whom they are appointed, but no Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner shall authorize an expenditure from the said sum of $2,000 proportionately greater for any period of the fiscal year than that portion of the fiscal year bears to the entire fiscal year.

Now, if a Member dispenses with his clerk altogether during the month of January, I do not understand that he can pay a double portion in February, because that would be a greater proportion than the month of February bears to the entire year.

Mr. TOWNER. I think the gentleman's interpretation is correct. It would seem to be true, then, that if in any particular month you employed additional help, if the total amounted to more than $166, it could not be paid.

Mr. BORLAND. I think that is true. I raised that question in the committee—that a man would not be entitled to spend $200 or $250 during the month of March and then recoup out of a later month.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is true. You can not recoup out of a later month; but I think it very clear from this provision that if there was any surplus left over from a preceding month the Member would be entitled to expend it for clerical services.

Mr. TOWNER. Then I will ask the gentleman if this would not be the case: For instance, you pay your secretary $125 a month, and that leaves a very small amount, comparatively speaking, between that and $166, the maximum allowance. Then, for instance, during the season when he is sending out seeds, or matters of that kind, he could not have very much help to assist him, because all he could expend would be the difference between $125 and $166. That would be true under the provisions of the bill, would it not?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That would be true if he had theretofore expended the full amount of clerk-hire allowance for the months which had passed.

Mr. TOWNER. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that, because he could not recoup from any preceding month more than the amount that would be required to make up the $166.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I beg to differ with the gentleman.

Mr. TOWNER. I am only seeking for information. The gentleman from Missouri seems to understand it as I have stated it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I differ both with the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Missouri on that proposition. It was the intention to draw this provision so as to allow for just that degree of latitude. If it is not altogether clear on that point, or there is any ambiguity, it can be amended, and we would be glad to have such an amendment proposed by those who find difficulty with its present form.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman point out what provision would permit a Member to expend the $2,000 in the last six months of any fiscal year if he failed to expend for clerk hire in the first six months of any fiscal year $1,000?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is this provision in lines 8 to 17, on page 20.

Mr. NORTON. I am following the gentleman.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It provides—

That each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner may appoint, for such periods and at such rates of compensation as he shall determine within the said sum of $2,000, a clerk or clerks who shall be subject to be removed at the will of the person by whom they are appointed.

Mr. NORTON. But that is modified.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It says—

But no Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner shall authorize an expenditure from the said sum of $2,000 proportionately greater for any period of the fiscal year than that portion of the fiscal year bears to the entire fiscal year.

Now, that seems to be perfectly clear. In other words, if four months have elapsed, one-third of the year, then the total amount for clerk hire which would have accrued up to that time would be one-third of $2,000, or $666.66. Now, it says specifically that no Member shall authorize an expenditure from said sum of $2,000 proportionately greater for any period of the fiscal year than that portion of the fiscal year bears to the entire year.

Mr. NORTON. That is just what I want to clear up. Six months are one-half of a fiscal year. Then according to that provision during the last six months the Member would not be permitted to expend more than one-half, the proportionate amount of $2,000. Is not that right? He could not expend more than half of $2,000 during the last six months.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It would depend on how much he had previously expended.

Mr. NORTON. If he had not spent anything?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If nine months have elapsed the Member would be entitled to spend for actual clerical services three-fourths of the $2,000, but he could not exceed that amount.

Mr. NORTON. Three-fourths?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Because he could not anticipate the amount of the future allowance.

Mr. NORTON. I think the gentleman is not correct. It says—

But no Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner shall authorize an expenditure from the said sum of $2,000 proportionately greater for any period of the fiscal year than that portion of the fiscal year bears to the entire fiscal year.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Take the month of October, which is the tenth month in the year. This bill provides that no Member shall authorize an expenditure—from the said sum of $2,000 proportionately greater for any period of the fiscal year than that portion of the fiscal year bears to the entire fiscal year.

Now, taking October as your month, the preceding portion of the year is three-fourths of the entire year.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Ending with September.

Mr. NORTON. Three-fourths of the calendar year.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, this says that the Members shall not be permitted to—authorize an expenditure from the said sum of $2,000 proportionately greater for any period of the fiscal year than that portion of the fiscal year bears to the entire fiscal year.

It seems to me, gentlemen—I may be mistaken about it—that there is no difficulty in construing that provision.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. If the gentleman has not already explained, I wish he would tell us where under this part of the bill the Member is permitted to have any part of the $2,000 accumulate at all. If the period means anything, it would probably mean a month. If it means a month, a man could not spend any more than $166.66 in any one month, regardless of how little he had spent in the preceding month.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. During the first month, under the clear provisions of this bill, a Member would not be permitted to expend more than one-twelfth of $2,000, but during the second month the proportion of the fiscal year would be one-sixth.

Mr. POU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. POU. Is not the purpose of the bill to require the Member to pay it out monthly as it accumulates?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Precisely, if that is his desire.

Mr. POU. One month is one-twelfth of the fiscal year, and he can pay out during that month $166.66. When the next month comes along he can pay out $166.66.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. POU. And he could not do any more than that.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. The gentleman has been stating that the period of time referred to in the bill would evidently mean a month. I would like to know why it means a month when you say "any period" of time?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It does not mean a month necessarily.

Mr. KEARNS. It says "any period of the fiscal year."

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; a Member can discharge his clerk at any time.

Mr. KEARNS. And in any one day you can not expend more than $5.33.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. A Member can not do more than that now.

Mr. KEARNS. The gentleman said he could employ additional help. If your secretary gets $1,500 a year, he would have $500 to his credit; and suppose there is a day you want to employ two or three additional clerks.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman knows that when he draws the monthly pay for clerk hire he is required to certify that he has actually expended the sum of $166.66. I submit that if any Member is following the policy of drawing $166.66 and withholding it for one month or six months, then he is not acting in conformity to the certification he is required to make in order to draw the allowance.

Mr. KEARNS. The gentleman is not applying his remarks to me.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, no.

Mr. KEARNS. For I never have seen a salary check since I have been a Member of Congress. My secretary signs my name to the check and gets the money and, of course, keeps it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can not understand why there should be so much criticism and protest by Members who employ more assistance one month than they do in others.

Mr. KEARNS. I do, and pay it out of my own pocket.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The solemn certification that Members make when they draw $166.66 is that they have actually expended it during that month.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. I believe everything the gentleman has said about the salary, but what I want to know is this: The Member is entitled under the bill to $5.33 a day, and no more. If a Member has a clerk employed at $1,500, he would have $500 to his credit each year, but suppose he wanted to hire three or four girls and pay them $2 or $3 a day. Under this bill you are estopped from paying more than $5.33 a day. Your clerk gets $1,500, or about $4 a day. If you want three girls in the office and pay each one $3, that would be $13, but you could not pay them out of the other $500 remaining to your credit, because you are estopped from paying out more than $5.33 in one day.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Under the certification Members of Congress are required to make in order to actually draw this money monthly, does the gentleman think any Member has a right to accumulate in his own pocket $500 for any particular month of the year? Is not he pledged and bound by the certification to have actually expended that amount of money during the month?

Mr. KEARNS. I do not think so; no.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will examine the receipts he has filed he will find that he has certified to that.

Mr. KEARNS. I tell the gentleman I never saw one; my secretary signs them and draws the money himself.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If he indorses them, he indorses them with the gentleman's assent and approval. I am referring to the receipt which the Member is required to sign.

Mr. KEARNS. In my case he gets the money, too.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not doubt that.

Mr. KEARNS. You can not spend under this provision out of the $2,000 more than $5.33 a day.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. You can spend $166.66 during the entire month.

Mr. KEARNS. But I am talking about a day.

Mr. POU. A month is the unit.

Mr. KEARNS. The bill does not say that a month is the unit. This is what the bill says:

> But no Member, Delegate, or Resident Commissioner shall authorize an expenditure from the said sum of $2,000 proportionately greater for any period of the fiscal year than that portion of the fiscal year bears to the entire fiscal year.

A day is as much a period as a month, or one-thirtieth as much. There is nothing in the bill here which says that a month shall be the unit, for it says "any period."

Mr. WALSH. They do not get a check every day.

Mr. KEARNS. And a day is a period the same as a month would be a period and——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will not make that point.

Mr. WALSH. I will withdraw the point of order, but I would like to hear something that is going on.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to say this to the House, that I have no objection——

Mr. WALSH. One would think this was the only item in the bill.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee (continuing). I have no objection in the world to answering questions that may be propounded to me with reference to this section, but I would infinitely prefer that we defer this argument until it is actually reached in the consideration of the bill, because undoubtedly it will provoke argument at the time.

Mr. KEARNS. I was asking in all earnestness; I wanted to get the information.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And I was very glad to give the gentleman what information I could.

Mr. KEARNS. The gentleman has been very kind.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I believe it is a universal practice among Members to have their seed franks and speeches addressed by the piece, at so much per thousand. How would you be able to apply any part of this allowance to that expense?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not know how he would be able to apply it, unless he sent in the names to the Clerk.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. How could he send in the names when he does not know what he is going to pay until after the work is done?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. He may then send it in, and it would be paid.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Their names must go on at the time he sends them in, and then they are dropped at the close of the job, and he only settles after they finish the job.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. He could send the names in to meet that sort of objection, I will say to the gentleman from Alabama, and indicate what sums he wanted paid to them at the conclusion of their labors. I do not think that presents the slightest difficulty. He could put their names on at any time if they had actually rendered clerical service.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I would ask the gentleman how could he indicate it when the work has not been done and it is paid for by the piece?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Because the Clerk of the House would have no right to pay any sum to any person employed by any Member unless the Member designated the amount to be paid.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. In advance?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Not necessarily in advance.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. But when the name is put on the roll it must be designated as the salary of the employee.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Not necessarily at all.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I do not see how otherwise.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. As I understand the gentleman, without reference to what has been done in the past, but after the passage of this bill and it goes into effect, if any Member pays for the first month any sum in excess of the monthly allowance that sum will be gone, he can never recoup it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Why, certainly, if this sum is paid in advance.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If he should pay $200 the first six months——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Precisely, because under this provision the money for clerical help would be paid to the person actually performing the services.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Why, certainly.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the Member paid any sum out of his own pocket in any one month, why, of course, there would be no way of recouping it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Well, during the session a great many of us employ more than we do at other times. I have two in my office at present, whom I am paying an amount in excess of the monthly allowance. Now, if a man should do that in the first part of the year, then, as I understand the bill, it would be lost; but if he in the first part of the year should pay less than the sum, then, in the later part of the year he could pay enough more to make up the total amount of $2,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If he needed the clerical services; that is the way I construe the provision.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It seems to me the bill ought to be amended so as to equalize that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Now, I will say to the gentleman that this provision would make legal just the sort of practice that a number of Members have presented here this afternoon, because, I wish to repeat, the check that is issued to each Member every month for his clerical help is issued on a receipt which bears the express certification that the same has been actually expended for clerical help, and the Member who indorses so certifies to his Government; and that is the only way that he can draw his clerical hire month by month.

Mr. SUMNERS rose.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If this provision is adopted it makes it perfectly legal for a Member, if he needs a $100 clerk in January and he needs two clerks at $100 in February, he to be the best judge of that, to make that employment legally by simply sending their names over to the Clerk of the House and having the sum paid directly to them. I want to say this—I will yield to the gentleman from Texas in a moment, if he will permit me—gentlemen will recall that last year an unpleasant incident happened because another distinguished body in another end of this Capitol undertook to provide legislation of this kind, not guarded as this is, but simply a provision placing clerks to Members upon the roll just as their clerks are being paid out of the Treasury.

The amendment adopted by that body came to this House, and a number of Members upon the floor of the House criticized it and opposed it, not on the ground that they were opposing the amendment as a matter of principle, but on the ground that there was an unwarranted interference by another body with this House in the administration of its own affairs. The committee has proposed this provision, with the view of giving to the House an opportunity to express itself on this particular proposition. If a majority of the House does not want to accept it, well and good, but we at least ought to have an honest and a fair expression upon this subject, because I happen to know, from statements made to me by many Members, that there are a great many Members of this House who have been clamoring for just this sort of legislation for years.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS. I just want to ask the gentleman this question: In view of the fact that there is not the same degree of uniformity of work in this body that is imposed upon the Members of the Senate, does not the gentleman think there ought to be a greater latitude in regard to the period of time in which this $2,000 may be expended by Members of the House?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And there is.

Mr. SUMNERS. So that in those periods of the year when we send out bulletin lists, or get out our garden seed, and do those things in months that are unusual in regard to the amount of work and in regard to the amount of expenditure, we ought to be permitted to make application at that time?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And if the gentleman who, I know, is a good lawyer studies this provision, and then studies the law authorizing the payment of clerical help to-day, and the manner in which it is paid, I am more than convinced that the gentleman will come to the conclusion that the provision recommended by the committee in this bill does give a much wider latitude just for that very purpose than you have under the present existing law, because it does not require a Member to actually certify that he has expended that much money during the month in order to get it. The money is paid directly to the clerk.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman from Tennessee not think that it would be quite an inconvenience to Members to have secretaries, two or three, or paying three or four people here for work and none probably at home? At home one would have to do his work by piece, and sometimes pay out in a month a hundred dollars or two hundred dollars. What is the point of this proposition?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This provision would not interfere with that sort of situation in the least.

Mr. MOON. Suppose, for instance, a Member has only $50 worth of work done last month, but may have to have $250 worth of work done this month. Does it interfere with that?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It does not interfere if the amount is not proportionately greater than the period of the year bears to the entire fiscal year.

Mr. MOON. What is the reason for having any proportions about it? Is it the idea that Congressmen can not be trusted to pay this out?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Not at all.

Mr. MOON. What is the use of tying it up?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And I want to ask the gentleman what is the objection to placing the clerks of the Members of the House upon the roll——

Mr. MOON. I have got none.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Rather than charging it to the Member?

Mr. MOON. I do not care if he is put upon the rolls. It does not make any difference about that. It is going to be an inconvenience to the Member to put him on the roll unless the secretary can be with him.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to take about 15 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed an hour.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. But the time was equally divided between the gentleman from Wisconsin and myself.

Mr. MOON. I shall not ask the gentleman anything further about it. This is new legislation entirely, is it not?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not concede that it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. MOON. I will show the gentleman how to concede it when it comes to the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. We will thrash that out at the proper time. Just briefly I want to refer to one other point, and that is that no one can thoroughly consider the method and the policy of the Government in paying the salaries of clerks and employees without coming to the conclusion that there is an utter lack of system and lack of uniformity in the present method.

It develops frequently that clerks in departments—clerks, if you please, at the same desk, performing exactly similar services—receive different amounts, which of course is manifestly unfair, inequitable, and unjust. There ought to be, in the interest of fairness not only to the clerks but to the Government, and in the interest of good and efficient administration, a reclassification of the salaries paid by the Government, and I hope that the time will come when Congress will take this matter up seriously and either through a joint committee, appointed from both Houses, or by an interdepartmental commission, conduct an investigation and enact such legislation as will secure uniformity and system in the payment of the employees of the Government, guaranteeing to each clerk that he will receive fair and honest wage for a fair and honest day's work.

I am aware, of course, that this is an inopportune time, because the times are abnormal and it certainly ought not to be considered or taken up during the war. But after the war, when times become normal, I hope that some such steps will be taken.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. I think I am in sympathy with what the chairman of the committee wants to do, yet I am confused by reading the language as to whether I have precisely what the chairman wants to reach. Do I understand that this provision is to prevent the expenditure of any more for any period than $166 per month?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Does the gentleman refer to clerk hire?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. As I construe it, and as I attempted to say a while ago, it permits a Member to consume during the entire fiscal year the $2,000, but it does permit a Member to have some latitude, something that he does not possess now, in distributing the $2,000 over the fiscal year, always with the condition that he shall not spend any greater sum at any particular period than is due, or, in other words, that he shall not anticipate in the expenditure of the amount allowed for the entire fiscal year.

Mr. FESS. Now, let me put a concrete example.

There is no possibility under this provision for a Member to spend more than $166 per month, whether he spends it in one month or in two months or three months, because if it is one month it is one-twelfth of the amount, and if it is two months it is one-sixth of the amount, and as I read it the provision is to limit the amount that can be expended, but not necessarily the minimum.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think the gentleman is clearly correct. During six months he can not spend over one-half and during the three months not more than one-fourth.

Mr. FESS. If he had not expended it all it would not be possible for him to expend the balance unexpended in a different month?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think under this provision it does give that latitude, something, as I say, that does not obtain at this time.

Mr. FESS. I am not contending about it, but I do not think the language will permit it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is the way I construe it, and I think if the gentleman will examine it more carefully he will possibly come to the same conclusion.

Now, gentlemen, in conclusion, and pursuing the remark I made a moment ago with reference to the necessity for reclassification of salaries, I wish to say that there has grown up a condition of affairs whereby some clerks sitting at the same desk, performing exactly the same services, draw a different amount in salary. It is wrong; it is unfair to the clerks and does not make for a good and efficient administration. I think that condition has largely grown up by reason of the fact that a number of committees make appropriations for the payment of clerks' salaries, and on that account these differences have crept in and have continued to grow and magnify. I think that is one argument for the concentration of the appropriation of salaries for employees in one bill. I am aware that when a member of the Committee on Appropriations makes that suggestion he lays himself open to the charge that he is trying to secure extra jurisdiction for the committee of which he is a member. It does not matter, gentlemen, what committee makes the appropriation, but undoubtedly a condition of the kind I have described will necessarily arise when more than one committee has charge of the appropriations for the different employees of the Government and in different departments. I am aware, of course, I am frank to say, that there will not be any change in the rules in that respect; but I do believe that a commission such as I have indicated could, after a thorough and exhaustive investigation, make recommendations to Congress which would cure this evil to a certain extent, for a time or for a period of years, until our manner of making appropriations results in bringing about another disarrangement.

Now, before I close I want to refer briefly to one department of this Government which without action by Congress has undertaken to establish an efficiency rate system, and that is the Post Office Department. The Postmaster General, as you know, was long a distinguished Member of this body and a very influential member of the Committee on Appropriations, and from his investigations during his service here he came to recognize this very evil of which I speak. When he became Postmaster General he called upon the Bureau of Efficiency and requested that bureau to come into the department in conjunction with a department commission that he appointed, and they rearranged and reclassified the salaries. And with what result? With the result that he has secured better and more efficient administration and at the same time, during the period that he has been Postmaster General, he has actually reduced his force 253 in number, saving sums aggregating several hundreds of thousands of dollars every year.

He has not done that at the expense of anyone or with an injustice to any employee, because he has dismissed no one. He has simply declined to fill vacancies as they occur. And to show that it has operated for the benefit of the employees as well as the Government, the records of his office show that since he became Postmaster General and reduced his force, saving the amount of money that I have stated, the average salaries of clerical help in his department have increased from $1,240 a year to $1,340 a year and the average salaries of the laborers in his department have increased from $720 a year to $776. And I hope other departments will eventually follow this plan, in the interest of good administration and fairness to all the clerks.

Mr. SNOOK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. SNOOK. In this connection there has been a very large number of young men detailed from different branches of the Army to act in clerical positions in different branches of the Government during the war. How are they paid? Do they receive salaries from the Army or are they carried in this appropriation?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They do not receive pay under this appropriation unless they are actually serving and performing a service called for in the appropriation bill.

Mr. SNOOK. There are many of them in the Ordnance Department and the Aviation Service in Washington, as well as in the other departments.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. When they enlist they are paid as enlisted men.

Mr. SNOOK. They are officers?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They are paid as commissioned officers. They do not receive any pay under the appropriations carried in this bill.

Mr. SNOOK. Does not that have a very great tendency along the very line the gentleman is speaking about as to the salary of people working at the same desk and having somebody drawing a salary as captain and some one working opposite to him drawing a less salary?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. So far as I am informed, that condition does not exist in the departments. I know there have been made statements to the contrary, or at least I have heard them, as to the War Department, but inquiry has failed to develop that that condition really exists.

There are, of course, many additional officers now serving in the War Department, but they are not doing what may be called strictly clerical work. The clerical work is performed by civilian employees carried in this bill, with the exception of the Navy, where yeomen and landsmen are called upon to perform clerical service.

Mr. SNOOK. I am talking about men detailed from the Officers' Reserve Corps. What service do they perform if it is not clerical service?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I assume that it is something of a supervisory nature with reference to carrying on the war.

Mr. SNOOK. You understand they do not do any clerical work at all?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. My understanding is that they do not do any clerical work whatsoever.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. On page 18 of this bill there are three or four special messengers and employees under resolutions which are mentioned as of certain dates. What do these employees do? They are under the Doorkeeper's department. On page 18, for instance, there is an assistant department messenger and others in a resolution of December 7, 1897.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I can not give the gentleman the names of those employees, because I do not know them. They were authorized, as the gentleman knows, by resolution of the House, and are performing the services for which they were originally appointed.

Mr. WALSH. That is, it is presumed they are.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think the presumption is not a very violent one; I do not know.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state in what part of the bill and under what title the barbers in the House Office Building are carried?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They are carried as laborers.

Mr. WALSH. Do they perform any other labor beside barbering?

Mr. BYRNS if Tennessee. They do.

Mr. WALSH. In the House Office Building?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Oh, in the House Office Building—I am frank to say to the gentleman that I am not familiar with the status of the barbers in the House Office Building. I thought the gentleman was referring to the barbers in the Capitol Building.

Mr. WALSH. I wish to refer to the ones in the House Office Building.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If they are carried on this roll they are required to do a certain amount of cleaning up by the Doorkeeper, because they are under his supervision, and during the recess of the House they stay here and perform the general work of a laborer.

Mr. WALSH. It would not be amiss to require them to clean up the barber shop, to keep that clean; but if their principal labor is that of barbers, why are they not called barbers in the bill?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. For the simple reason that Congress does not undertake to provide for barbers. If they were carried as barbers they would be expected to shave Members free.

Mr. WALSH. If they are not barbers, why are they permitted to carry on the work of barbers?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I suggest that there may be two answers to that. All their time may not be required in performing the work required of them as laborers. I am informed that the barbers here in the Capitol perform work in the early morning and in the evening cleaning up certain corridors of the Capitol and certain rooms.

Mr. WALSH. They are paid $660 a year to put in a couple of hours' work a day, are they?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They have certain rooms and corridors to look after, for which they are responsible.

Mr. WALSH. For which they are paid?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. For which they are paid $660 a year.

Mr. WALSH. And the rest of the work they perform is merely a gratuity on their part to such Members as may desire to avail of their services?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I assume that the reason the custom has grown up to permit them to conduct the barber shop during the day is for the convenience of Members, because I apprehend it would be very difficult to secure barbers to come to the Capitol and open a shop, depending entirely or altogether upon the somewhat limited custom of the Members here.

Mr. WALSH. And yet there is such a shop in the Capitol, is there not?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am not aware of that fact. Now, gentlemen, I have detained you much longer than I anticipated.

Mr. KNUTSON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Very well.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman spoke about the efficiency of the Post Office Department. Did the gentleman intend to include in his remarks the Railway Mail Service, for instance?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; my remarks were confined altogether to the department clerks here in the District of Columbia. I had no reference whatever to the postal employees in the field. That is a matter which does not come within the jurisdiction of this bill, and I have no information concerning it.

I want to thank the gentlemen of the committee for their patience. I will reserve the balance of my time. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3752) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes, had agreed to the conference asked by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, Mr. POMERENE, and Mr. TOWNSEND as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee resumed its session.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have the attention of the committee on the question of the need of farm labor, a subject that has been much talked of, and properly so, but which I think is becoming acute, as judged from the vicinity where I live and the letters which come from that community.

Mr. MADDEN. Before the gentleman enters upon the discussion of the question, I would like to make a suggestion to him.

Mr. FESS. I will be glad to have the suggestion.

Mr. MADDEN. I think it might be illuminating to what the gentleman has to say upon that question. All over the United States men who have been prosperous farmers have moved from the farm into the village and have no employment, and they are now whiling away the autumn of their lives in ease and comfort. Why would it not be a good idea to discuss the advisability of having those men who are experienced farmers go back and take another "rip" at it during the war?

Mr. BORLAND. Including possibly the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. I would be perfectly willing; and I may say to the gentleman from Ohio while I am making this suggestion that I have already asked the Secretary of Labor in a written communication whether he has any statistics showing the number of men of the class I have suggested who might be utilized in the development of the farm and the raising of the food supply of the Nation while they are not within the years that enable them to fight in the ranks.

Mr. FESS. When my friend first offered the query I thought there was a degree of levity in it.

Mr. MADDEN. No.

Mr. FESS. But I admit that there is not, and it is a legitimate question. And as I now recall some of the localities that I know, I am sure there are a good many of what we call retired farmers that have come off the farm and now live in the little village, fed by the farm; and, as I now recall, a good many of them direct farms of their own through their tenants that they have upon the farm. Just how much loss of labor to the farm that element would make is, I think, a matter of legitimate investigation either for the Department of Labor or for the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. MADDEN. The amount of loss would depend on the age of the men who are on the farm and may be drafted.

Mr. FESS. If I may be permitted to give an opinion without knowing exactly the facts, I am rather of the opinion that a large proportion of those people have not only gone away beyond the draft age but really beyond the effective age on the farm for heavy work.

That would be my opinion from personal information. But I could not offer that as comprehensive. Really, members of the committee, this is a critical question, becoming more so with the months. I hesitate to offer any letters I have received, because it is so common to receive letters of complaint that a letter of complaint need not be regarded as conclusive of a situation. But these letters are nearly all of the same tenor, and I am quite certain that they are not in a spirit of faultfinding, although some of them are based upon lack of information. For example, I have three or four letters which openly charge that there has been unfair discrimination in the operation of the draft law as administered through our local boards, in refusing exemptions to farmer boys when they claim that exemptions had been allowed to city boys. Now, I do not believe that there is any real foundation for that statement.

I can see how a farming community would miss a boy who has been a good farmer and who they think ought to be exempted, if he is taken, and a refusal to exempt him would probably intensify the feeling more than the refusal to exempt somebody in a city, where there are so many people that the going would not be so much missed or so noticeable as it would be in a farming community. One of my farmer friends insisted that 90 per cent of the farmer boys who were called were taken, and that very few of them were exempted, while a great number of city boys were exempted. I made the statement to him that he was most likely confusing the idea of exemption with the idea of rejection for defects, and that I thought—although my statement was denied by some Member on the floor the other day—that there were more persons accepted from the farm because of freedom from physical defects than there were from the cities. When I made that statement some one here said that the figures proved otherwise. So that while I think that is true, without a doubt, in my immediate county, it may not be true taken as a general proposition. Therefore I can not speak definitely on that point as a nation-wide statement. I see a good many Members shake their heads, indicating that they do not agree with my statement.

Mr. WALDOW. I understand Gen. Crowder made a statement showing that you are wrong.

Mr. FESS. Does the gentleman give that as an opinion or as a matter of information?

Mr. WALDOW. As a matter of information.

Mr. FESS. That Gen. Crowder has made the statement that the rejections on account of physical or mental defects are not greater in the city than country?

Mr. MADDEN. I will say to the gentleman that Gen. Crowder has a record of all the exemptions, from every class, in every congressional district in the United States, and can furnish detailed, accurate information as to the causes for the exemptions in every congressional district, if Members want to apply for it.

Mr. FESS. Does the gentleman make the statement that he says there are fewer rejections from the city than from the country?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know; but I know that very few exemptions have been made from my own territory except for physical defects, or because of the fact that they were not citizens, or that they had family obligations that exempted them as a matter of right.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman from Illinois will understand that my statement was that I thought there were not more exemptions in the city, but that there probably were more rejections; but if Gen. Crowder states that there are not more rejections for physical defects from the city than from the country, I would have to revise my opinion. However, I still think that rejections from the city are more numerous than from the country, otherwise our much-vaunted open-air advantage over the congested and badly ventilated city situation does not stand for much, in fact. It is a favorite theme of most of us that we would much prefer to bring up our families in the open country, and health was ever the one desideratum.

Mr. CRAGO. Gen. Crowder divides the physical defects into the urban and the rural, and he says there is a slight difference in favor of the urban—that is, that the percentage of rejections on account of physical defects is slightly less in the city than in the country, but the difference is very slight.

Mr. FESS. As an individual with a good deal of pride in having my statements accurate, I thank the Members for the statements they have made, if made on authority, because if that is true that the health of the city boy is better than that of the country lad, I think it is a very remarkable fact, and I repeat much of our much-boasted country life must be discounted.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. In the Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD are some very interesting figures in a letter from Gen. Crowder to Congressman MCKEOWN, of Oklahoma, on that subject. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. FESS. I would be very glad to have them at this very time, that an authoritative statement on the point may go to the country in connection with this discussion.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. He says:

> Statistics to be found in the report of the Provost Marshal General to the Secretary of War, dated December 20, 1917, disclose that in 1917, 13,843,578 persons comprised the field of labor appurtenant to agriculture. Of this number only 205,731, or 1.48 per cent, of the entire field were determined by the boards to be liable to call for military service, and less than .0074 per cent of the labor supply appurtenant to agriculture was actually withdrawn therefrom by the first draft. The effect of that draft is thus shown to have been relatively insignificant, and the conclusion that the shortage in that labor supply is attributable in any substantial degree to the draft is thus shown in a most striking and conclusive way to be erroneous.

Mr. FESS. That statement goes to the question of proportion of farm laborers taken in proportion to other occupations. That does not cover the question I offered as in explanation of the charge that farmers' boys were refused exemption, while city boys were granted it, in which I suggested that these people were confusing exemption with rejection, which would indicate no unfavorable discrimination against the farmer.

However, I do not understand the force of the general's statement that the idea that any large proportion of the agricultural source of labor had been taken is an erroneous idea; because certainly there has been a very large proportion in my own vicinity that has been taken, to the extent that it has worked great harm in my immediate community, which is a very striking agricultural section. What I was trying to urge, however, is that I do not believe there is any basis for the statement that there has been any discrimination in favor of the city as against the country boys in the operation of the draft. I do not think there has been, but I know there is a suspicion in the country that the charge is true. I think it ought to be cleared up here, because such suspicion creates a bad state of public opinion wherever it exists. I thought the explanation of so many more boys going from the country than from the city in our community was that it was due to rejections instead of exemptions in the city. But we will pass that, with the hope that the real facts may be so clearly set forth by the department that all suspicion may be removed from every community.

Mr. Chairman, agriculture is facing a crisis this spring, due not so much, if at all, to the operation of the draft, but rather by way of comparison with other activities of the war. In my own community, for example, the Wilbur Wright Aviation Field was built during the summer, and not far from my home the Camp Sherman cantonment was built. Both took much of the summer. The war activities, of which the construction of these Government buildings was but a part, stripped our entire community of its labor. This came right in the midst of corn cultivation and a little before the harvest time. It of course ran through the summer and totally absorbed our labor throughout the busiest months of the farm, including harvest time, when to save the farm crop labor had to be secured. The situation in my immediate community was acute. It appeared for a while that the year's work was in certain jeopardy. This, of course, was not due to the draft, but to war preparation.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. The demand for labor was so great and the prices so high that the men went from the farms to accept other employment.

Mr. FESS. That is what I mean. My whole community was totally stripped of labor that theretofore had been dependable for farm work. They went into these cantonments to get large wages and to work where there were a great group of men. The inducements held out by the Government were persuasive not only as a patriotic service but the high wages offered were unlike anything that community had ever experienced.

Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to these Government activities, recognizing as I do that it had to be done and that additional prices had to be held out in order to induce the farm laborer to leave the farm at a time when the farmer could not afford to lose him. To all protests the reply, of course legitimate, was that this work must be done and that it must be done now; that in order to get it done the Government will have to take from work that is permanent the laborer and place him at temporary labor, and to do that much higher prices than is paid where the labor is permanent, and especially rural, must be paid. Consequently when the Wilbur Wright field got into full swing all the farm labor in our country went. The same thing was true in building the cantonments. I am speaking now of Ohio in my particular section.

If you had gone through the southern and southwestern parts of Ohio in the months of October, November, and December, you would have seen this year what you never have seen before—field after field of corn, some standing on the stalk uncut and others standing in the shock unhusked. Many of the fields were not put in wheat that ordinarily would have been put in wheat. And when you asked why the corn remained unharvested the quick reply comes, "All of our help is gone. We have not the help to husk and put the corn in the crib." And then you ask the question why it is not fed in the shock to live stock, and the reply comes at once, "Well, we have had a very good price for live stock and it has been sold, and what we have left we can not afford to keep for feeding because we have not the help to feed it."

Mr. OVERMYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. OVERMYER. At the close of the gentleman's remarks I expect to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter from Provost Marshal Gen. Crowder on the question of exemption of farm labor, and in that letter he gives some interesting figures.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] has just read those figures into the RECORD.

Mr. OVERMYER. I thought they were of sufficient interest to be put in the RECORD.

Mr. FESS. Now, whatever be the cause of the loss of labor to the farmer, that is no longer important except as it may be corrected. The fact remains that he has not the labor. The question at once comes before us, How are we going to assure the country that the food supply of next year is not going to be kept up with the past production but most certainly not increased? It can not be unless we find the labor for it. There is no use to mince words, the vast acreage of America means nothing unless cultivated, and cultivation depends almost wholly upon farm help.

Mr. ALMON. The conditions of governmental activities will be different in 1918 from what they were in 1917 as to the construction of cantonments?

Mr. FESS. The construction of cantonments, it is true, will be less if not entirely completed, but in the shipbuilding plants and in the munition plants, the real war activities, it will not be true. There is a city not far from the home of my colleague, Mr. OVERMYER, that is the center of war activities for munition making. Although it is 150 miles from my home, it has attracted many men from my own town. It is war work. That is pretty general over Ohio. So I will say to my friend from Alabama that I can not believe that we have a great hope from the letting up of war activity, so that we can be assured that this labor will come back to the farm. Both the war demands and the abnormal prices paid are against such hope.

Some suggestion has been made that we take the labor out of the loafing places. I have a series of letters, all running in the same line, asking why we do not go to the towns and take out of the saloons and the loafing places those people who would be vastly better off if they were put on a farm and made to work. Probably the same reason such worthless human jetsam would not qualify for the Army would make them wholly undesirable in a respectable farmer's home. Another suggestion is that we go to the city employment bureau, and there find the labor that has been rejected by the draft on the ground of defects or for other reasons have not been called, and take them to the farm.

Now, I am very sensitive myself about making any statements that would be resented by our city dwellers. I have lived in the city and I have lived on a farm. Since I have reached my majority I have lived in the city, including five years in the second city in size in the United States. I fairly know the city, and I know the farm as it used to be, before modern methods came in vogue in scientific farming. I know the customs and habits of the farmer in his home and what he must do and what he expects others to do. I know about their getting up in the morning and about their regularity for meals and about their going to bed at night.

If you will allow me, I will say that it was my pleasure to work on a farm up to the time that I became a citizen of 21 years of age. I have been on farms where the farmer expected me to retire to rest by at least 8.30 o'clock, and in the summer time that is a little after sundown. While that seems to the city dweller incredible, yet had he worked in the field as I have worked he would be glad to find his rest at early dusk. I have been out in the field, my friends, a mile or more from the house and barn, with the horses plowing corn before the sun was up, and that was in the summer time when the sun rose early. That meant up in the morning before the break of day, even before the birds were astir, in order to feed, curry, and harness the horses, feed the other stock, and then take breakfast by lamplight. I was under the regulations of a high-grade farmer, and I want to say now that those were among my happiest and most healthful days. If you would take a city boy out on the farm like that where he hates the night because it is so dark, and longs to stay in the city because it is light, where he hates the country because it is so lonely and quiet and he wants the city because it is so social and gay, you can not get him to bed at night and you can not get him up in the morning. These farmers who know the business of farming simply will not be bothered with that sort of interference, and that is all there is to it. I know whereof I speak. They would prefer to do what they can themselves and leave the balance undone. The average farmer guards carefully his live stock, and especially is careful in the handling of his horses. He will positively refuse to allow every Tom, Dick, and Harry handle his horses.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Certainly I will yield to my much-respected colleague, Gen. SHERWOOD.

Mr. SHERWOOD. By what authority could we take bums and compel them to work on the farm?

Mr. FESS. My colleague presents a pertinent inquiry and shows by it, although himself a resident of a city, he knows and appreciates the demands of the farm, and discerns keenly the futility of the suggestion that farm labor can be cared for by the bums or saloon loafers. He especially appreciates the matter of handling stock, as no man in the country knows more than he about horses and the importance of proper treatment not only of fine roadsters but great draft and farm horses as well.

The same can be said of the care of fine-bred stock of every character on the farm. To suggest that this is the business of loafers is little short of an insult to the farmer of to-day.

I beg the pardon of my colleague. I was going to answer why we did not take these persons from this or that place when I got into this particular line of thought, and I would not change my answer, because what is true of the city lad would be true of what these people call the loafers in places where they are not working. A farmer would not stand for that thing.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. I take it, then, that the gentleman feels that the farmer does not do business on a seven-hour basis?

Mr. FESS. My friend is so obsessed with that particular contention that he often tries to embarrass gentlemen——

Mr. BORLAND. I should regret exceedingly to embarrass the gentleman. Nothing is further from my thought.

Mr. FESS. There is no embarrassment to me, I would assure my friend from Missouri. I have never been embarrassed by hours of labor.

Mr. BORLAND. I thought the gentleman was discussing labor and the cause of the shortage. I may have misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman is not going to get anywhere by this sort of publicity; it does not mean anything. The farm situation I do not think can be materially relieved by taking these people from the city. It might be relieved in a degree if there was a wise selection, because we do know that in the city there are numbers of people who are inclined to rural work and who would really work with a heart upon the farm, but you would have to exercise wise selection in order to make it effective.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to suggest that a city laborer is wholly unfit to work on the farm; that it takes as much experience and skill to make a farmer as to make a mechanic.

Mr. FESS. I know that.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. It is nonsense to talk about sending the men to the farm for a season or for a limited period. It is a business that has to be followed during a long life.

Mr. FESS. I admit that, and I think I could state without hesitation or danger of being embarrassed for stating it that it takes more skill to-day to be a real, successful, scientific farmer than it does to be a very successful lawyer or a success in any of the literal professions which for years have been the ambition of our promising youth, and the preparation for which meant years of training.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Or a Member of Congress.

Mr. FESS. Oh, yes; or a Member of Congress. The farmer has to know the chemistry of the soil, which alone is a world of investigation in itself; he has to know the current of prices to know what to emphasize this year and what the next; he has to be a political economist, so as to know the lines of production; he has to reconcile production with consumption, and to say that all that a farmer needs is the ability to drive two horses and hold a plow handle is simply silly.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. And yet is it not a fact that the champion cotton pickers of the land come from the cities during the cotton-picking season, who never worked anywhere else except in the cities except during the cotton-picking season?

Mr. FESS. I would ask my friend from Texas, admitting that I do not know about that, is the cotton picker that comes from the city selected or does he come in a promiscuous group?

Mr. BLANTON. They wait for the cotton-picking season to come and leave their places as cooks and mechanics and laborers in the city and go to the cotton fields.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. As I understand, the people to whom the gentleman from Texas refers are colored people from the cities.

Mr. BLANTON. Colored and white. Some of the champion pickers are white.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Colored people are naturally cotton pickers.

Mr. FESS. Is there any particular skill required in cotton picking?

Mr. BLANTON. We draw from the cities in every department of the farm during the harvest season, during the harvesting of oats and the wheat——

Mr. FESS. The gentleman does not answer my question. Is there any particular skill required in cotton picking?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly there is. I dare say there is not a Member of Congress here, who has not picked cotton, who could pick 100 pounds in a day if he tried; and yet there are men who pick 500 pounds in a day.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Is it not a fact that these city people that the gentleman from Texas speaks of are really people who learned to pick cotton in the country before they moved to the city?

Mr. BLANTON. That is largely true.

Mr. FESS. That would be perfectly safe. Of course, there are any number of people in the city who have lived on the farm, whose training was received on the farm, and who could profitably be returned to the farm.

Mr. BLANTON. The point I was trying to make is that in every farming section dependence is placed upon the labor from the city during the harvesting period.

Mr. FESS. That may be true of some sections, but not of every section. I know that it is not true of my section of the country. Our people are scientific farmers, and, by the way, are the most independent of all our citizens.

There is another phase of this labor problem that I am going to mention, and I do not do it with any offense to anyone or any group of our people. The farmer frets terrifically under the exactions of union or organized labor. The purpose of organized labor is to better conditions of the laboring class of our citizenship, a perfectly legitimate ambition, indorsed by the country; to increase wages; to shorten hours; to insure better conditions under which labor is performed. These humanitarian movements, which are always the result of groupings of people, which especially will be noticed in factory life or wherever congestion of population obtains, are entirely wanting, as everyone knows, on the farm. Consequently, if you take some one who has been identified with union labor and put him out on the farm you can see precisely what would happen.

Now, let me read a paragraph or so from one of my correspondents, and this correspondence is simply spontaneous; it has not been the result of any inquiry made by me. These are letters which incidentally come to me about the farming situation. He says, in regard to the farm-labor question:

> I was recently told by a friend what his experience was during the last threshing season. He helped out a job of thrashing on a farm owned by a city man. The owner of the farm brought some help from the city. The farmers that went to help paid no attention to the time of day in commencing work. The town fellows, however, would not begin until a certain time and they would not allow the others to work, either. There you have a sample of organized union labor on the farm. They not only refused to work until they got ready, but they refused to allow anyone else to work. Some of them are not worth much even during working hours or anything except smoking cigarettes and filthy talk. I do not believe I exaggerate when I say that such help is a curse on the farm.

Now, while that statement may be a little overdrawn and it may come from a person who has had an unfortunate experience, yet we all know that such exactions can not be fruitful of good results on the farm and men inclined to demand such observances are a real detriment on the farm, which can not for a moment depend on such labor.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will wait a minute, I beg the gentleman's pardon—yet there is some basis for my correspondent's feeling. He is not accustomed to this sort of thing out on the farm. Now I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman realize what would happen to a man down in the country in which I live who would try to start something like that on the farm?

Mr. FESS. I do not. There is another suggestion that has some currency, and that is the organization of the boys and girls who are now in school to take them out in the months, say, of April and June. Many of these schools—high schools, like our famous township high schools throughout the country in most of the States—have an attendance that comes largely from the farm, many of them from the little villages. They know the farm. Now, I think in an emergency like these war times, when food is the slogan, while I believe thoroughly in conserving the time in the schools for our boys and girls, yet I believe that in this stress that policy ought to be tried; that there ought to be a unified effort throughout the country, and it ought to be through cooperation with school authorities, to let the boys and girls go out on the farms, to be free certain months in the year; and while we have no authority, of course, I would like to see the school authorities give credit for the work they do on the farm, so that this work need not necessarily prolong the school age. I mean to allow this work on the farm to count for that which otherwise they would have to do in the schoolroom. In other words, I would not want to prolong the school period as a punishment because they had gone out to do this helpful work. I believe that that can be done, and it would be wonderfully fruitful for this reason. All of you know about the corn clubs and the United States agricultural clubs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman desire more time?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I have been interrupted so much.

Mr. STAFFORD. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. FESS. Fifteen minutes, if you can allow it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield the gentleman from Ohio 15 minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 15 additional minutes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I am very much interested in what the gentleman is saying; he is making a very profound discussion of a subject in which the entire country is interested. I know he has given some thought to the subject of furloughing some of the farmer boys who are in the Army for the gathering of the crops this summer. What has the gentleman to say on that subject?

Mr. FESS. I will say to my friend that I am going to take that up in due time. The facts are that these observations are now being made in order that I may present the identical phase of farm help suggested by the question. The movement, as I was discussing when the question was asked, in the organization of corn clubs and the household economic clubs, by offering certain prizes to the boy for the greatest yield of a given character, or to the girl who gets the best results in kitchen or otherwise, whatever the prizes are offered for, has proven to us beyond a doubt that farm ability can be wonderfully enhanced by encouraging general movements of interest among the young people on the farms and in the villages where they know the farm, and I believe that is something that ought to be taken up at once as an emergency measure, both as a State and National movement. I understand that in New York there is an organization of the girls by some woman's movement. I saw a statement here in Washington where there is such a movement on the part of a woman's organization. Such a movement is now in vogue in my own district, where local organizations reaching from city to country are attempting to enlist all the people in a campaign of production. All of these will have helpful results, I am sure. Then there is another phase along that same line. However, I do not want to take that up at this particular juncture.

With reference to getting the labor from the Army camps, I will now address myself to what I think is a feasible and workable proposal. There will be, everyone will note, some inconvenience, even if we pass such a law, and there will also be some striking disappointments, because if we pass such a law, which I hope we will, and it ought to be passed soon if it is passed, the farmer will expect his own son to come to his farm.

Now, of course, we can not assure him of that. He would naturally rather work his boy, who is acquainted with the farm and the teams and all that goes with that particular farm, than to have some other soldier and give him a home for the time being, and while that ought to be done in the degree that it is possible to do it, you can see at once that it is bound to work a very great disappointment in various communities, and I have been trying to keep our people informed about that, that they must not expect their own son in every case to be returned. But there ought to be a relief, and I think there can be, from this particular method. Here is a letter that indicates a possible disappointment:

I would like to be furloughed for the reason that I shall now state. As father has a farm now rented of 208 acres, which is located—

I do not want to identify this boy, because he is writing me from his camp, is now in service as a military boy, and it might work him some inconvenience. He continues:

My father is unable to get the help to run the farm. He has out now 80 acres of wheat; he is going to put out the same amount of corn in the spring. If I get out and help him, as I have been the main support of him, he will be able to have this work done. Father has 12 head of horses, 15 head of cattle, 75 head of sheep, 35 head of hogs that he can not give proper attention. He has not been able to get any help all winter, and he has not got the last year's corn crop out yet. He can not get anybody to help take care of the farm, and I think I can farm and do it better and with better results than any hand that he can secure. Father is 65 years old and is unable to do any kind of work in the field. Father has not done any work for the last six years. He has been depending on me to do the work. I have tried to indicate here briefly some of the reasons why I should be furloughed.

Now, you read this letter, and between the lines you have a suspicion that the boy is not entirely happy in the Army and would like to get out. However, what he says would make a strong case for exemption; but if it is impossible to exempt him—and that can not be since I have presented the case to the War Department, which refused exemption, since he is already in the service—but if it is possible, for him to be given a period whereby he could go back on the farm and work for a specific period, it would be a great benefit not only to him but to his community. He would probably be rendering a greater service to his country by so doing than to remain in the military service.

That letter is one of a great many in the same line. The only trouble is you can not discriminate where a boy wants to work the farm from a desire to get out of the Army. We have got to recognize that in the passage of any bill that we enact here.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Is it the gentleman's idea that the former boys in the Army ought to be permitted to go home and make the crops?

Mr. FESS. My idea is that there ought to be a quota permitted to go home at certain periods of the year and assist on the farm. I would not say all the farmers should do that. That, of course, would be impracticable.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. My constituency is a farming constituency, and I was just wondering what would become of the Army if they were to demobilize it to this extent.

Mr. FESS. The Army is not composed wholly of boys that come from the farms to start with, and not all the boys that come from the farms ought to be furloughed, especially at any one time. Nothing can be done to disorganize the plans of the military service. My point is that there is a positive need for farm labor, and we have got to meet it, and I do not know where you can get more effective labor than to collect from time to time selective groups in the camps for turning back to the farm, and allow them to return as soon as the period elapses. I think that is important. They would be the most effective men you could possibly find in the country.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the gentleman from the Military Committee.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman will understand that possibly those men would be furloughed who belong to camps or divisions or organizations that were not immediately destined to overseas work.

Mr. FESS. Certainly. That is my meaning.

Mr. TILSON. Or, in other words, from those units from which they could be spared with the least demoralization to the Army itself?

Mr. FESS. Certainly. I would not think of interfering with the Army in its military requirements.

Mr. TILSON. So that it would be impossible to single out of these men individual men, because they might belong to the very organizations that were going overseas first.

Mr. FESS. And that is the one thing that will make the operation of it inevitably disappointing back home. That is what I meant. Of course, we would not think of emptying the camps. It is a selective method, taking what we can allow to go, where we can do it effectively during this crisis.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Do you not think if that sort of an act passed or if that kind of a regulation was formed that a very large number of those in the Army would be asking for furloughs?

Mr. FESS. I am sure of it. But their going would not depend upon their wishes, but upon the selection made by the authorities.

Mr. HASTINGS. Do you not think it would have the effect of demoralizing the Army?

Mr. FESS. I will say to my friend that I do not think it would have such an effect. The boys in the Army are under military training, and one of the first things we learn—and I know it by not only my own experience, but by the experience of some people who are very close to me—is absolute obedience to the rules of Army life.

Mr. PLATT. In the good old times, when the schools used to educate great men, and we all know they do not do it nowadays——

Mr. FESS. I do not accept that statement as a fact.

Mr. PLATT (continuing). Boys did not go to school except in the winter, and they worked on the farm in the summer time.

Mr. FESS. I do not know whether my friend thinks that we ought to dismiss the modern schools and go back into the one-room schools or not, where you could teach 55 classes per day, as I did in my first term.

Mr. PLATT. If you will read the life of any great man in the country, you will find he went to school only in the wintertime and worked in the summer time; and that is what we ought to get back to.

Mr. FESS. I am afraid that my friend is in the class of those who consider that under the modern system nobody can spell, because they study other subjects besides the spelling book.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio if he requires any more time?

Mr. FESS. If it would not embarrass the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is pressing me, but I will yield.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I have received a number of letters from farmer constituents telling of the impossibility of conducting their respective farms because of the taking away of their help. What does the gentleman from Ohio think of the proposition to have the statute made mandatory that help essential to the carrying on of a farm shall be absolutely exempt from the draft?

Mr. FESS. I do not believe that we would dare exempt agriculturists as a class. I think it would be inequitable and undemocratic.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Not as a class, not all agriculturists; but we can not exist without food, and the only people that grow the food are the farmers. Suppose, now, there are three boys on a farm; should it be optional with the board to permit all three of those to go or should one of them be exempt from the draft, where the mother is a widow and has no other help? I have exactly that case in my district.

Mr. FESS. It seems to me that such treatment would be unfair to the party in interest. The draft law as it now is written would permit one or two of those boys to be exempt, and it should be so administered.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If the gentleman will permit, it is left discretionary with the board.

Mr. FESS. Yes; I think it ought to be so left.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Should it be left discretionary with the board? Should not the public welfare, the necessities of the Government, require in such cases that the statute should be made mandatory, and that the work on the farm shall not cease in the production of food necessary for the Government?

Mr. FESS. Well, I confess it is a little confusing to me to say that you should make it mandatory simply because of the difficulty in many cases to tell whether that particular boy really ought to be kept on the farm or not, when it is a question of whether he is needed or not. I had a case like this brought to my attention and I carried it up for exemption, and the party said to me, "Why, this boy is not needed on the farm. He is in the university." I said, "Certainly; he is in the university, but he is studying agriculture in order to go back and be a trained farmer." I was astonished to be told then that he was not studying agriculture, but he was studying law. They wanted him on the farm, but they had sent him away to study law. He should not have been exempted.

I think we have got to leave a discretion somewhere, and not make the law mandatory. I certainly believe that there ought to be greater favor to agriculture shown in interpreting the law relating to exempting these people than there has been exercised.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In the case the gentleman cited there must have been somebody on the farm doing the work while the boy was absent.

Mr. FESS. His father was on the farm.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But supposing his mother was a widow. I have that kind of a case.

Mr. FESS. I think that is a case of unwisdom to refuse to exempt that party. I think there should be greater care exercised in the exemption of the agriculturists. I feel sure it will be used in the future.

Now, in reference to the furlough question, it might be of value of the committee to know that several bills have been introduced, one by the Committee on Military Affairs, and such a measure will come into the House in due time, if it can be brought in by the Committee on Military Affairs. I think that is very wise and ought to be done very soon, because in some sections of the country the time for farming is on.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Before the gentleman leaves that point, I will state that such a bill has been reported out of committee. It has either been ordered reported out or actually has been reported out.

Mr. FESS. So I understand from the chairman of the committee, with whom I talked only to-day.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Who is to use this greater latitude in the future?

Mr. FESS. Of course, it will be the appellate board.

Mr. LINTHICUM. If the gentleman has in mind these local and district boards, I can say to him that I have in mind a young man who is working 70 acres of land. He has an uncle 70 years old and an aunt 75 years old. He was put into one of the low classes and went before the district board and was then put in class A. He has 70 acres of land. I do not think that that is much latitude.

Mr. FESS. When I said "latitude" I was probably misunderstood. I mean there ought to be greater favor shown in exempting the farmer boy than has been exercised hitherto.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I have several cases in mind, cases in my neighborhood, where they have farms; and they take them all without any distinction whatever, apparently.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ALMON. While we are discussing the issuing of furloughs to some of the farmer boys who are already in training, at the same time we understand from the press that in all probability there will be another draft, probably about the 1st of May, right in the midst of the crop time, when other boys will be taken from the farms. What would you think of the idea of legislation to the effect that no farmer boys shall be taken into the second draft or be called until some definite time, say, the 1st of August, in order that they may aid in making this crop?

Mr. FESS. That suggestion might work considerable inconvenience in the training ability. We must not allow any of these items to stand out against the training for the war as an entirety, and if it should happen that no call is made up to a certain period, and there would be no training up to that period, I would be fearful that that might interfere with the plans of effectually prosecuting the military program, and I would hesitate to do that.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Certainly. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Does not my colleague believe that it is just as essential that we have boys on the farm to work the farms to produce the necessary foodstuffs and supplies as to have them in the Army?

Mr. FESS. Of course, we are compelled to have labor on the farm.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to a case that was brought to my mind a few days ago. It is the case of two brothers living in my district, their father and mother both being dead. They had left to them a farm, and they have worked hard to get the debts cleared off the farm. They have improved machinery and a nice stock of cattle on the farm. There are only two brothers and a sister. The draft board has called both the brothers into the service and placed them in class A. It seems to me that the Government made a serious mistake when it took those young men off the farm when we need all the agricultural help in our country that we can get to do the work.

Mr. FESS. I will say to my colleague that I think, according to his statement of the case, that is a serious situation and ought to be remedied. Surely such cases will be corrected if they are presented to proper authorities. We can not trifle with the question of food production.

Now, gentlemen of the committee, if I may be permitted to go on without interruption until my time expires, I have three or four things that I want to say to the committee connectedly, and the first is this: As to these various suggestions of securing help, another suggestion has been made to take help out of the State prisons, out of the penitentiaries. In a great many places a movement is on foot to take them out in groups, say, to work 10 or more men under one command, and take them from farm to farm. I do not know whether that would be workable at all. I do not know why it could not be, although I have not gone into it. It has already been suggested.

Another suggestion is for the State itself to aid by furnishing to certain areas tractors. Ohio is in great activity just now on that suggestion. The governor of the State has recommended it, and the State university is offering to show how it can be done. The idea is for the State to purchase outright a great number of tractors—not to loan them out, but to put them out under some skilled operator and let him go from farm to farm in the community and gather the community together—and let them, in a community way, work the farms.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. FESS. I did not get to finish what I wanted to say. May I have five minutes more?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. FESS. I am very much obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to ask the gentleman one or two questions after he gets through.

Mr. FESS. This asking for more time is getting to be a joke, but I did not mean it to be so. The tractor proposition, as I say, is receiving a good deal of consideration in Ohio. New York is also becoming active in this form of relief. I here insert a dispatch in to-day's paper:

The State of New York will furnish 61 tractors for service on the farms of the State this season. The plan under which these tractors may be rented and used is announced to-day by Director C. J. Huson, of the bureau of production of the New York State Food Commission.

Application for these tractors should be made direct to Director Huson at the office of the food commission, Agricultural Hall, Albany, N. Y. Every tractor must be used to plow 200 acres or more for food crops.

The plan under which these tractors may be used will make them of the greatest possible efficiency in plowing and fitting land for food production. In 1917 New York State was the pioneer in this work in the United States, having purchased and put out 42 tractors. This year the lessons learned in 1917 will be put into effect, and each tractor will be more efficient and of greater service because of what was learned last year

TWENTY NEW TRACTORS.

One of these tractors may be had in any one of three ways. Under plan No. 1 an organized group of farmers, five or more; under plan No. 2 an experienced and responsible tractor operator; or under plan No. 3 an individual farmer may get one of the machines. Rules are provided for each plan.

Of the 61 machines 20 will be new (purchased this year), the other 41 those which were used last year. Each machine will be accompanied by either a two-plow or three-plow outfit, including harrow. A specified rental is to be paid the State, as follows: Secondhand two-plow outfit, $50 to $60 for the season; secondhand three-plow outfit, $75; new two-plow outfit, $75; new three-plow outfit, $100.

The full details will be communicated to anyone interested upon request. Some of the more important details are as follows: The organization or individual signing the contract with the State must assume responsibility for the machine and pay the rental; must pay for all necessary repairs, fuel, oil, freight (within the State); and deliver the machine next fall to the nearest railroad station or properly house it for the winter. He must also guarantee to plow at least 200 acres during the season and to keep the machine in use every possible day and only for plowing and fitting land for food production, except when special permission for other use is given by the commission.

PLANS FOR THEIR USE.

Under plan No. 1 the group which gets the tractor must limit its use to 40 acres for each member of the group, one half of which may be done in the spring and the other half in the fall. Under plan No. 2 the operator who may get the tractor may not plow or fit more than 40 acres (20 in the spring and 20 in the fall) for any one individual. Under plan No. 3, if an individual farmer secures one of the machines, he is permitted to plow but 60 acres (one-half in the spring; one-half in the fall) for himself. Under all three plans the tractors must be kept in service as nearly constantly as weather permits. The charge for the use of the tractors is limited to $1.25 per hour for a tractor up to 10–20 size, or $1.50 per hour for a tractor above the 10–20 size, or if the charge is made per acre to $3 per acre for plowing and 75 cents per acre for harrowing once over.

I have heard certain objections to the tractor proposition; that the need of labor is not so great in the planting season as it is in the harvesting season. But I think the need is about as great in the planting season, for the simple reason that in our section of the world every day is not seasonable. We have got to make hay while the sun shines. You have got to get your ground ready. Then you must get your crop in. That is one reason why we are insistent that we must have good seed, for if you plant seed that is not good, by the time you find out that the first planting is a failure the season is gone and it is too late to plant a second crop.

Mr. TILSON. Does not the gentleman think that if a man makes an almost superhuman effort to get a crop planted, and then he gets a good crop, he will make more than a superhuman effort to harvest it?

Mr. FESS. Absolutely; there is no doubt that is true.

So much for the tractor suggestion that has been discussed in Ohio and New York, if not elsewhere.

Another suggestion that I think every Member of the House ought to have in mind is that we are going to suffer from want of crops next year because of the fact that we did not have the assurance of labor, and many of our farmers have sown their farms in grass, which will not be broken up at all and will not produce the cereals. Now, it may sound strange when I state to you that a large proportion of the vicinity in which I live, which is an agricultural community of a very high grade, has done that very thing. Let me read to you from a letter that is exceedingly suggestive. This letter comes from the president of the Red Cross movement in my town, who has given up all of his time to war activities. He has 300 acres of ground, a splendid farm, with tenants on it, but they have gone, all but one, and this is what he says:

From personal observation there is a growing feeling expressed among the farmers, true at that, that the farm products depend upon the farmer; that the people can not live without the farmer and his products. This feeling can easily grow to a condition that might become serious. Labor is his great drawback—good, competent labor. Often his help is on one part of the farm while he is working at a distance. The farmer has been overworked, tired, discouraged from the help standpoint. This leads to his giving up, selling out—or, as in my own case, I have prepared to use as much stock on pasture as possible; and if our assistant is called to the colors—and he is subject to be called—our farm will have to go on a 50 per cent capacity. Not that I want to, but am forced to make the best out of a bad condition.

That letter is written by one of the most patriotic men we have in our community, and he is working constantly for the interests of the community.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's additional five minutes have expired.

Mr. LINTHICUM. He had 10 minutes, as I understood.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. FESS. Out of this condition we have this certainty: There is not going to be as great a cultivation in acreage next year, if my community is at all a fair representative, and it will not be because the people are not interested in the war. It will be because they say, "We simply can not do it, and we have got to make the best of a bad situation."

Take that as one thing. Then add to that this other fact that all must admit: The corn last year did not mature, as it usually does, because of the early frost. Corn is out in the field where it has remained all winter. This was the hardest winter that any of us has gone through in reference to the keen cold. All through our country we are told that most of the corn which otherwise would make good seed corn is absolutely worthless as seed corn because of its immaturity and having been out all winter and perhaps other reasons. I had a man come into my office who is one of the best agriculturists in Ohio. He was on his way to see Secretary Houston. I gave him a letter to the Secretary in order to present that corn situation from the standpoint of seed to the Department of Agriculture here. He told me that he had taken the corn and tested it as they usually do, and that he finds section after section of the fields where the corn is perfectly useless for seed. That, I fear, is going to create a great disappointment in the yield this coming year. All through my section there are movements by county organizations attempting to select the good seed from the worthless. There is really a serious situation which is alarming the people.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman, but there is one matter to which I should like to call his attention, as his time is drawing short.

Mr. FESS. That is all right.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman has spoken about the need to produce a crop and about the future food products of the country. I want to call the gentleman's attention to an article which appeared in a Baltimore paper, which deals with the subject of the hotels. As the gentleman knows, the hotels have changed their mode of serving meals. Whereas they formerly served a portion that could be divided between two people, now they have made them all individual portions. They charge about the same for an individual portion that they once charged for a large portion and you have no right to divide that with anyone.

I have a clipping here from a Baltimore paper, in which it is said that the hotels claim that this is not an advantage to them, but that what is left over when they serve too much for one person and will not let it be divided with anyone else goes to the waiter. The article says:

These are the property of the waiter, to give away, take home, or sell. What he does not want goes to the bus boy, the waiter's underling.

It was also pointed out by the managers that the practice of serving a portion for two people existed in the days when the individual portion was called the half portion, and that it had been found advisable to refuse to serve individual portions to two people on account of the necessity of restricting patronage to the more desirable class of guests.

"There are plenty of people," said one manager, "who live in nail bedrooms and who would come in and order one portion of a single dish to divide between them. It does not pay us to encourage that class of patronage. The practice of charging an extra amount for service of a single portion to two people is also open to many abuses from the standpoint of the employees. The waiters are apt to play favorites, and it would be next to impossible to check up on them."

Of course, I think we will all agree that the reason stated by that hotel manager is a very foolish one. Does not the gentleman think the hotels of this country ought to be investigated on this question of the waste of food? They have adopted this system for the primary purpose of getting a larger price from the people, and then they serve more than one person can eat. I have particularly in mind one case where two of us went to a hotel; they served me enough for three people. Yet I was compelled to purchase the same amount for the other person, and what was left—about half—was sent into the kitchen for whatever might be done with it. It is an outrage upon the people for the charge made by most hotels for single portions, and it is discouraging to everybody by the waste of food caused by this method of extortion.

Mr. OVERMYER. I will say to the gentleman that the Lever bill, which has been referred to our committee, will be taken up very soon. It takes up that very question, which we hope to present to the House very soon.

Mr. FESS. I am very glad to hear that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. FESS. May I have three minutes more?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is so reasonable in his request for time that I certainly will yield him the three minutes and hope that he will not be interrupted.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to occupy so much time of the committee, but this is a subject that has been fugitively discussed by individual Members who have been offering observations upon it, and I felt and feel now that there is a possibility of a crisis that none of us fully comprehend.

The truth of the matter is the submarine is not out of commission. The truth of the matter is the submarine activity is on the increase. There are more ships being sunk than before, there is more food being sunk than before, and we all know that with our soldiers across the seas we are going to be on the sea more with our food. With a lessening of food in Europe, as must be inevitable, and an inevitable lessening of food in our own country from present conditions, everybody must see that here in the face of the most perfectly organized military machine the world ever saw, in the persistent effort to sink what food it can find on the seas and with those sinkings increasing, you are losing at both ends. You are not only losing in productiveness but in destructiveness. And so it is high time that we not only make every foot of our ground produce to its maximum but make everybody conserve to the very minimum. Then, as to the war-garden proposition, we got $350,000,000 additional fruitage last year; but we want to increase it this year. We ought not to be compelled to suffer loss, as is suggested by my experience in this town when a Government clerk told me that he had a little vacant lot out here that he wanted to plant and they wanted $8 for plowing it. That is an outrage; the Government ought to take over the vacant lots and see that they are cultivated, and if the Government does not do it the city authorities ought to do it.

I need but call attention to the city of Springfield, Ohio, where the office of the city manager undertook the war-garden work last spring. A census of the available garden plots in the city was made, and when seeds were distributed free by the city, if the person asking for seeds had no place to plant them, a lot was turned over. After finding that lots could not be gotten ready for planting on account of scarcity of teams and plows, the city employed several teams to plow and harrow the lots. When fields could not be secured by donations, the city rented them and cut them up into war-garden lots. Ordinances were passed protecting these city lots from vandalism and theft. When the crop was harvested the city established a clearing house where those having vegetables for sale could bring their product and dispose of it without the necessity of peddling it about the city.

This coming year the work will be continued. There now is being planned a systematic campaign to reach out over the county to augment the yield of the farms tributary to the city.

Mr. RANDALL. The Government ought to stop the use of 60,000,000 bushels of grain for the breweries.

Mr. FESS. I emphatically agree with that statement, and will do all in my power to stop it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman ought to know that brewery products are food. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT].

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I have noticed in the newspapers from my district, and generally throughout Pennsylvania, that it is the intention to close not only the colleges but the public schools one month earlier this year than ordinarily for the purpose of releasing the students, that they may go upon the farms and increase the product of the land.

The result of that patriotic action will, of course, add much to the sum total of the Nation's food products. I represent a great agricultural district of Pennsylvania, including a large portion of the fertile Cumberland, Tuscarora, Kishacoquillas, Trough Creek, Path, Buffalo, and the Big Valleys. A more productive soil nowhere exists on earth, nor are there better farms anywhere; and yet in the newspapers coming from this section I find the statement that more farmers are this year offering to sell out and leave the farms than in any other period in the history of this section.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes; although my time is brief.

Mr. LITTLE. How much an acre do they want for these farms?

Mr. FOCHT. They are very valuable farms. I will answer the gentleman's question more understandingly a little later. The reason they are leaving the farms is because they do not have the farm help to get the maximum of production. As the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] has said, they are patriotic; the farmers are all patriotic and they have done their share, but they are discouraged to the extent that many do not want to go ahead with their accustomed plans on account of the uncertainty as to help.

Now, I wish to state, without inserting in the RECORD many letters from the section of the country where these boys go from the farms, the fact that many must reduce the acreage under cultivation this year. There is one instance at least, according to a letter I have received, where a farmer was unable to get his potatoes out of the ground last year and where the corn remains to-day unhusked in the field.

There was a farmer here the other day, a patriotic man and fine citizen, whose son volunteered and is down in Texas. Inasmuch as the selective method of raising the Army does not carry into practice the early understanding that there would be exemptions in the more needful occupations, such as farming, all he asked was what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] suggested—a furlough. I give these instances in the hope that there may be worked out some method of returning to the farm, temporarily at least, on furlough during the planting season and the harvesting season some of these boys—not loafers picked up around in the cities, whom the farmers say would be more of a menace and a nuisance than a help, but these practical farmers who know the farm and who left it to go to the war. And what my farmer friend asked was not that his son should be relieved from any of his obligations as an American citizen and a patriot, but when he was willing and anxious to serve his country he wanted the boy to come home on a short furlough and help put out, then harvest the crops. In the absence of his son he is alone and his wife is an invalid, and he would be obliged to reduce the acreage; and to reduce the acreage now would be as fatal as reducing the activities in the preparation and increase in numbers of our Army and military equipment.

Therefore, representing this agricultural community, and having these specific cases brought to my attention, I am prepared to second the thought of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] in the hope that the committee, in their wisdom, may be able to work out some plan by which these farmers whose sons have left the fields to go to the Army may not be compelled under the force of necessity to curtail the productiveness of the agricultural districts. [Applause.]

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The gentleman speaks of furloughing during the planting and the harvest time?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Does the gentleman simply mean it for a few weeks?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes; if nothing better can be done, a few weeks, not in excess of a month, since it seems they are not to be exempted entirely.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I do not know anything about the farming conditions in Pennsylvania, but I do know that in Iowa they need about the same amount of help from March until October, because one kind of work follows another. It is planting and then more planting and cultivation and the harvest and the thrashing and in the fall there is the husking of the corn.

Mr. FOCHT. Exactly.

Mr. RAMSEYER. And a few weeks' furlough, if it is in planting time in the spring and a few weeks in the harvest, would not solve the problem with us.

Mr. FOCHT. It would in some measure. Of course the farmer himself would have to be helpful there; but, as for hay and wheat and oats, there is an interval between harvesting these and the harvesting of corn, during which they might go back to the Army. Those are the principal crops of the country I represent. It would differ, to be sure, according to climatic conditions, but it could be adjusted so far as the greater portion of Pennsylvania is concerned.

Mr. RAMSEYER. In a country where they have small grain, like the Dakotas, I can see where a few weeks in planting and in harvest time and at thrashing time would be of very great help.

Mr. FOCHT. That would have to be worked out by the intelligence and the wisdom of the agencies in charge of the program.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has not yet given me the price of that land.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. In due time the gentleman will have an opportunity to vote for a bill which will permit the Secretary of War to furlough men for a shorter or longer period, as it may be determined is best toward winning the war.

Mr. FOCHT. I consider that a wise provision. I would like to have time enough to answer the gentleman from Kansas, who says he desires to know the value of the land in the seventeenth Pennsylvania district.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman said that they had the finest farm land in the world and were anxious to sell.

Mr. FOCHT. No; not anxious to sell the land, but some farmers desire to quit because they would be compelled to reduce acreage.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman said he never saw so many who wanted to sell their farms.

Mr. FOCHT. They are mostly tenants advertising stock and equipment because of the labor conditions that exist.

Mr. LITTLE. I want to get the price.

Mr. FOCHT. I assume that the more land there is on the market the lower the price would be, and that price, of course, would be measured according to the quality of the land, buildings, and so forth. In my section land sells anywhere from $50 to $250 per acre.

Mr. LITTLE. That would be my theory.

Mr. FOCHT. That would follow as a matter of common business practice.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I will ask that the gentleman be yielded one minute more.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I would like to ask the gentleman what effect he thinks price fixing has had on the farmers of our country? In other words, the Government has fixed the price at which he must sell his products, when the price of labor is out of sight.

Mr. FOCHT. I will answer, in a general way, that I regard all of the fixing of prices and the attempts to break down the law of supply and demand and the evident fuel regulatory fiasco as necessarily demoralizing and discouraging. Particularly is the arbitrary price fixed for wheat far from commensurate and below adjustment with other commodities and supplies the farmer must buy in the open market. In considering the high wages now paid labor we must not overlook the fact that the purchasing power of a dollar is only half what it was in 1914; hence the increase of wages for labor is the only method by which adjustment to meet high prices of commodities can be accommodated. My answer might be more amply embodied in a few remarks I made on the floor months ago, when the food-control bill was under discussion, and which presumably was to increase the food supply and bring down the then soaring prices. I quote from my observations of prophecy as contained in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 3, 1917, and also an editorial from the Chambersburg Repository, as follows:

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I simply desire to say that I have grave doubts as to the efficiency of this measure. I doubt that it will accomplish any good results. In the presence of the multitudinous agencies that are now in force to regulate everything and everybody in this country I doubt very seriously whether any single individual is big enough to extend himself with any effect over this great Western Hemisphere, or, in fact, over the whole world, which, according to the provisions of this bill, he will have the authority to supervise. However, this authority has been sought by the Chief Executive and by the majority party in power, and, inasmuch as they have sought it and are to assume the responsibility for it, I am willing that it shall be done. But for the fact that I am called away to the hospital on account of the sickness of my daughter I should vote for the conference report, but I shall not be able to be present when it is voted upon. I wish to reassert that I do not believe the bill is going to accomplish anything whatever except confusion and disorder, disappointment, if not disgust, and dismay throughout the land, much as I hope to the contrary.

[From the Chambersburg Repository.]

THE FARMER'S SIDE OF THE QUESTION.

From reports Repository has been able to gather from over the county there is going to be a material shortage in crops this year as compared with last year. We have made a special effort to learn facts from the farmers as they visit Chambersburg, and all seem to have the same report to make.

No person can justly criticize the farmers of Franklin County after the great efforts they made last year. Nor can anyone question their loyalty to the Government and their desire to help in every way possible to win this war. The question is, Have they been given the square deal they deserve?

The cry is everlastingly going up to conserve food here at home that we may be able to ship more abroad. "Do not waste" is what we see placarded all over the country, and glaring electric signs in large cities tell the people the same thing. And the people, largely, are complying with the request, but what are we to save for our men at the front and in the camps, as well as our allies, if we fail to produce? Production is the great thing that is necessary to win the war. Saving is entirely proper, but production must first be considered and it is being considered, but how? Wheat is the great staple food product and the cry goes up day and night, "Give us more wheat and save the flour that we may have more wheat." The farmers are asked to produce wheat in greater quantities, yet wheat is the one item of farm production on which the Government places a fixed price and says, "So far shalt thou go and no farther."

What is the condition of the farmer, the man who produces the wheat and who is urged to accomplish greater results than he has been able to do in the past? He finds himself confronted by a price fixed for his crop of wheat. People who do not go into all the facts say that is a good price and any man should be able to raise it at that price. Let us see. Place the normal price of wheat at $1 and the price fixed by the Government is an increase slightly over 100 per cent of the normal. The farmer in order to sustain his family and keep up his farm is obliged, like every one else, to buy other things. Does he find a price fixed on these? Not at all. He pays anywhere from 200 to 300 per cent more for what he buys than he formerly did. Foodstuffs, feed for his stock, machinery of all kinds, fertilizer, everything has advanced far more than the advance allowed him on his wheat.

Another thing. It is impossible to procure help on the farm. The young men whom the Government has not taken away for the Army have found employment in cantonments, manufactories, and elsewhere at wages the farmer could not think of paying. Without help how is he expected to increase his production? He simply can not do it. The result will be that he will sow this year only what he can reap himself and with what aid he can procure from his own family, which, in many cases, has been materially depleted by the draft. The farmer can do so much and no more, and that is just what he will do this year, and this means a big shortage in wheat and all other crops. It is absolutely ridiculous to insist that the farmer should do the impossible.

If crops are to be increased there is but one way to do it. The Government must either stop taking the boys from the farm or provide others to take their places. If the war is to be won by greater production of wheat and other farm crops, men are just as essential on the farm as they are in the trenches, and the Government should make some provision to supply them. There are thousands of men employed in various branches of industry where nonessentials are produced. There are men clerking in stores and in other places where women could fill the positions just as well. If food production is as essential as carrying a gun and the Government can draft for the latter, why can not it do so for the former? It is not improbable that we will come to this before very long. A man has just as much right to sacrifice in order that food can be secured as has the man to sacrifice his business to enter the Army as a soldier. If something like this is not done we may expect greatly reduced crops, not because farmers are unwilling to do their full part, but because they are deprived of the help necessary to produce the crops now demanded. If this war is to be won through the production of large crops to feed the Army and allies, the farmers must be given help with which to do it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OVERMYER].

Mr. OVERMYER. Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to say, as I stated a while ago, that I had intended to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein a letter from the Provost Marshal General touching the question of farm labor. On investigation, however, I find that a letter in substance the same was inserted in the RECORD under the date of the 25th instant by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN]. The letter contains a great deal of interesting information, especially showing the percentage of farm labor that has actually been withdrawn in the first draft and that will be probably withdrawn in the second draft. I quite agree with the statement of the Provost Marshal General in that regard, that the dearth of farm labor is not due in any large degree to the operation of the draft. It is due to a variety of causes that have been in operation for a number of years. The migration of people toward the city, the suction of industries during the past two or three years, with high wage scales in the cities, has done more to create the present dearth in farm labor than the operation of the draft, and the letter gives interesting figures on that subject.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OVERMYER. I regret I can not yield to my colleague.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BELL].

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, in the time allotted to me I desire to submit the report of the commission created by Congress to investigate the pneumatic mail-tube service.

REPORT OF THE COMMISSION TO INVESTIGATE PNEUMATIC-TUBE MAIL SERVICE.

The commission appointed by the act of Congress dated March 3, 1917, to investigate the value of pneumatic-tube mail service, submits herewith the report of its investigations, together with the report of its engineers and auditors, a transcript of the public hearings, and copies of reports and briefs submitted by the Post Office Department and the owners of tube properties.

Under the provisions of the act creating the commission, it is directed, first, to investigate the value of the tube service; second, the value of its properties, franchises, and other equipment, with a view to the purchase and operation of the same or any portion thereof by the Government; and, third, to ascertain the cost and terms upon which such purchase may be made. Broadly interpreted, the commission was directed to determine whether the tubes are a valuable and necessary postal facility for a reliable and expeditious mail service in the larger cities.

After having given careful consideration to the testimony submitted at public hearings in the different cities, an inspection of pneumatic-tube service; a consideration of the report of its engineers and auditors, and the briefs submitted by the Post Office Department and the tube companies, the commission has reached the following conclusions:

1. That pneumatic tubes as now installed for carrying letter mail are necessary for proper postal service and should be continued in the cities of New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago, and St. Louis, but that extensions are necessary in St. Louis to obtain adequate tube service.

2. That being an exclusive postal facility, the systems should be owned and operated by the Government.

3. That a combination of tube and automobile service tends to promote efficient postal service in large cities.

4. That the Post Office Department should operate tube service with its own employees, thereby insuring greater cooperation.

5. That the purchase price of the tube systems should be extended over a period of years in such a manner that partial payments, together with 4 per cent interest on unpaid balances, including costs of operation as reported by the commission's engineers, shall not exceed the present annual expenditure of approximately $976,000 for tube service.

6. That the purchase price for the systems now in use in the Postal Service be determined by a reference to the Interstate Commerce Commission, who shall fix a physical valuation for each of the systems in the cities of New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago, and St. Louis at a sum not to exceed $4,432,622 for the entire systems. In determining these values, said commission shall consider the nature and condition of the titles to the properties in each of the cities named.

The commission has given careful and extended study and investigation, first, to the utility value of underground pneumatic-tube service as a postal facility in the large cities where the quantity of first-class mail and street congestion demand special consideration; second, to the subject of Government ownership of such methods of mail transportation; and, third, to what is a fair valuation of the properties of the tube companies now under contract with the Post Office Department. For some time this subject has been before Congress. Each member of the commission, by reason of service on the Post Office Committees of the House and Senate, had already given the subject considerable thought and study. A mass of testimony, data, and information has heretofore been submitted during hearings before the House and Senate Post Office Committees and in previous congressional and departmental reports.

The systems in the five cities mentioned are privately owned and operated under contract with the Post Office Department, for which Congress has appropriated during the last 11 years approximately $1,000,000 per year. A 10-year contract for tube service expired June 30, 1916, and since that time the service has been continued by congressional action.

On July 16, 1915, the Postmaster General appointed a committee of postal experts "to make careful investigation and report as to the needs and practicability of pneumatic-tube service in Boston, Mass.; New York, N. Y.; Brooklyn, N. Y.; Philadelphia, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; and St. Louis, Mo., preliminary to the consideration by the Postmaster General of the issuance of an advertisement for such service for the term beginning July 1, 1916, the report to be submitted not later than October 1, 1915." Their report was filed with the Postmaster General October 13, 1916. He extended the contracts to December 31, 1916. Congress afterwards extended the contracts first to March 4, 1917, and later, in connection with the authorization of this commission, to July 1, 1918.

The report of the postal experts recommended the discontinuance of tube service in all the cities, with the exception of that portion in New York below Forty-second Street, and recommended the retention of the service above Forty-second Street only on condition that it could be secured at a very material reduction in cost.

The recommendations of the Postmaster General coming before Congress for consideration were attacked by Members of Congress, the public, the press, and by the owners of tube properties. Hearings were conducted by the Committees on Post Offices and Post Roads both in the House and in the Senate. They extended over a period of four days before the House committee, and for six days before the Senate committee. The House of Representatives voted to continue the usual appropriation for tube service, and an additional amount for an extension to The Bronx in New York City. The Senate amended the provision by continuing the existing service and authorized the appointment of this commission, which action was later concurred in by the House.

The views of the Postmaster General with respect to tube service may be summarized as follows: That since 1906, when the present contracts were made, the postal conditions have so changed that the tube service is neither necessary nor desirable. The reasons assigned are stated to be:

1. The introduction of parcel post.
2. The use of automobile mail trucks.
3. Increase of letter mail to a point beyond the capacity of the existing tubes.

The commission, therefore, has given careful study to the utility value of pneumatic-tube mail service, has instructed its engineers to make thorough and careful investigation into this phase of their inquiry, and has itself endeavored to ascertain accurately the views and reasons of the public and postal employees as to the value and the necessity for providing such a means of transportation for first-class mail. It has examined the reports of previous post-office administrations, and particularly the report of the congressional investigation submitted to Congress in 1914, of which Senator HOKE SMITH, of Georgia, was chairman. Indeed, the investigation of this latter commission enabled this commission to avoid a great amount of work which it otherwise would have been required to do.

The commission has carefully kept in mind the distinction between the importance of the delivery of first-class mail, in which the Government has a monopoly, and that of other classes of mail delivered through the Postal Service. The former commands a high rate of postage. It is closely identified with the social, business, financial, and industrial life of the Nation, and therefore demands special treatment.

It can not be permitted, except at the expense of efficiency, to go other than in the most direct lines, without delay or hindrance, from the point of origin to destination. Any other consideration that would retard or slacken its progress would ignore the very important duty the Government owes the public to provide a highly developed first-class mail service. Rapid transmission of first-class mail should be provided independent of and divorced from the movement of the less important and lower classes of mail. No other course can be reconciled with the proper and just demands of the public or the duty the Government owes to the patrons of the Postal Service, who provide the funds with which it is maintained. But for first-class mail the social and business fabric of the Nation would be greatly impaired. The greater the efficiency, therefore, in the methods and devices adopted to improve the service the greater it stimulates the social and commercial activities of the people.

All of the larger financial institutions located in the great cities, and many of the large business and manufacturing concerns having active relations with clients, customers, or branches located outside the city, rely upon the mails for handling and recording thousands of necessary details involved in the orderly conduct of their business affairs. Many of them do not rely upon the postman for collections and deliveries, but at their own expense maintain a special service between their offices and the post office or station through which their mail is cleared. Some of them, especially the great banking institutions, send for and receive their mail, in some instances, every 30 minutes during business hours; and many of them maintain such a service, though less frequently, during the entire night in order that clients and customers may sustain the least possible delay with respect to business intrusted to them through the mails.

It is not a question of what character of service is sufficient, but what is the best possible service, within reasonable limits of expense, that can be provided for such important customers of the Postal Service. It must be understood, however, that each patron of the Postal Service can not always receive that degree of service which his individual business demands or that he feels he should have. The Postal Service must be maintained with due regard for conditions in any given locality and in the country as a whole. The policy of those responsible for efficient postal management should be, however, to keep pace with the growth and development of the country and the necessity for a constantly improved service.

The viewpoint of the public, as it appears to the commission, is that letter mail pays for and warrants the highest grade of postal service; that there should be no deterioration in the service; that where cities are spending millions of dollars to widen streets and to put traffic above ground and underground, the Government should not add to that traffic by abandoning existing means of underground transportation of mail; that the mail truck is a menace to the life of persons along the streets and tends to obstruct traffic. These are factors in this inquiry which the commission considers are established by the facts.

The tubes carry a large portion of the first-class mail in the cities where established. They were constructed with the sole purpose of facilitating the delivery of letter mail. To replace the tubes with automobiles would doubtless effect an economy, estimated by Stone & Webster, engineers for the commission, at $114,522 per year. The commission is of the opinion, however, that delays in the delivery of large quantities of letter mail would result from this action. In this connection the engineers say:

No number of automobiles, even at a cost exceeding that of the best combined automobile and tube service, could obtain all the advantages of a combined service.

The records of the Post Office Department indicate that from three to five million letters are advanced in delivery each day by the tubes, which otherwise would be delayed. The commismission feels that the additional cost for providing expedition for this amount of mail is fully justified. The engineers for the commission estimate that the extra expense of tube service under Government ownership as compared with the cost of the necessary automobile service to replace the tubes, if discontinued, would be about $312 a day. The commission concludes that for this sum Congress can well afford to provide this special service for three to five million letters daily that are enabled thereby to reach their destination earlier, which would not be true if tube service were dispensed with.

Mr. ROUSE, a member of the commission, does not agree with the recommendations above stated and will submit a minority report.

At the suggestion of the commission, the secretary has prepared and appended hereto, under appropriate subdivisions, certain data and comments, approved by the commission, regarding the various phases of the investigation under consideration.

MARCH 1, 1918.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BELL. I will.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand the commission recommends a continuance of the pneumatic-tube service in certain cities under certain circumstances.

Mr. BELL. No.

Mr. RANDALL. Are there any cities which have had that service that are omitted from the recommendation?

Mr. BELL. None, so far as I am advised.

Mr. RANDALL. What about San Francisco?

Mr. BELL. Well, I did not know San Francisco ever had this pneumatic-tube service.

Mr. RANDALL. It has had it in the past. I would like to ask whether the commission visited San Francisco before this report was made?

Mr. BELL. The truth is this commission was called upon under the resolution adopted by Congress not to recommend the discontinuance of the pneumatic-tube service only in event the commission came to the conclusion that it was not a good postal facility.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman have any objection to my using five minutes of this time? If not, I will yield five minutes to my colleague, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWNE].

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Chairman, Tuesday, February 5, 1918, is a day that will long be remembered by the American people. The transport Tuscania, with 2,179 American soldiers on board, on their way to the battle fields of Europe, was torpedoed and sunk by a German submarine when off the north coast of Ireland, and 209 American soldiers were lost or unaccounted for.

The news of the sinking of the transport Tuscania was flashed over the country and brought home most forcibly to every mother and father in the land the sad realization of war.

The War Department was besieged by people and thousands of telegrams were received by it inquiring of the safety of the boys who were either on or were supposed to be on the Tuscania. With commendable promptness and accuracy the War Department made public the list of survivors as they were received by cable.

All are familiar with the vivid accounts given by the press of the torpedoing and sinking of the Tuscania on the eve of February 5 by a German submarine; of the tremendous impact and explosion when the torpedo struck the transport; of the lowering of the lifeboats and of the transport settling deeper and deeper in the water; of the fine discipline, splendid nerve, and heroic courage of our boys thousands of miles away from their homes, as they stood at attention, with the Stars and Stripes floating over their heads, waiting their turn to take the lifeboats, every man as cool and under as much self-control as if on dress parade. The fact that out of 2,179 men on board only 209 were lost in this disaster, under all the circumstances, with German submarines lurking in the vicinity, is a high testimonial to the splendid order and self-control of the officers and men. Most of the soldiers rescued were landed at Buncrana and Larne, Ireland, Wednesday morning, February 6, and also on the Scottish coast.

At these small ports of Ireland and Scotland where our troops were landed they met a most warm-hearted reception on the part of the people who did all in their power to administer every comfort and care. The survivors of the Tuscania laid their dead comrades at rest, with the usual military honors, on the rock-bound coast of Scotland, where proper monuments will be erected to mark their graves.

On Fame's eternal camping ground
Their silent tents are spread,
And Glory guards, with solemn sound,
The bivouac of the dead.

Nor shall their glory be forgot
While Fame her record keeps,
Or Honor points the hallowed spot
Where Valor proudly sleeps.

WISCONSIN'S PROUD RECORD.

Wisconsin has responded to the call of the country in this war, as in all others, with a patriotism second to no other State. In 1861, within six days after Lincoln's first call for volunteers. Wisconsin responded with its first regiment, and 19 companies more had offered their services. At that time, with a population of only a trifle over 700,000, Wisconsin raised an army of between 90,000 and 100,000 men. After the declaration of war with Spain the War Department was surprised at the early wire from the Governor of Wisconsin to "Send on your medical officers, our National Guard is ready." Wisconsin's second and third regiments were among the earliest arrivals at the camp in Chickamauga.

In the present war no State in the Union has responded more loyally to every demand made by the President than Wisconsin. The United States Naval Institute proceedings of August, 1917, contains a table compiled by the Department of War. This table shows, first, the quota required from each State; second, the number of the National Guard on April 2, 1917; third, the enlistments in the National Guard from April 2 to June 30, 1917; fourth, the enlistments in the Regular Army during the same period; fifth, each State is credited with the total in service on April 2 and the enlistments up to June 30, 1917; sixth, the number of men to be drafted. These figures show the total of the National Army at the last-named date as 1,152,985. The total credits, including those in service on April 2 and those volunteering up to June 30, are 465,985; this left 687,000 to be drafted. The total credits form 40.4 per cent of the Army. Wisconsin's volunteers numbered over 54 per cent of her quota.

Wisconsin thus ranks first in the percentage of credits; in other words, more of her citizens volunteered in proportion to the quota assigned than any other State in the Union. I herewith give a table showing the figures from 12 of the most populous States:

	Quota.	Credits.	Per cent.
New York	122,424	52,971	43.2
Pennsylvania	98,277	37,248	37.0
Illinois	79,094	27,304	34.5
Ohio	66,474	27,588	41.5
Texas	48,166	17,488	36.3
Michigan	43,936	13,569	30.8
Massachusetts	43,109	22,448	52.0
New Jersey	35,623	14,896	41.8
Missouri	35,461	16,740	47.2
California	34,907	11,786	33.7
Indiana	29,971	12,409	41.5
Wisconsin	28,199	15,274	54.3

Wisconsin was the first State to report its registration list to the War Department at Washington under the recent conscription law, and it overran the Government's estimate in its registration. It oversubscribed its apportionment in both Liberty bond issues, and very much oversubscribed its quota for the Red Cross. One city of 20,000 inhabitants in the district I represent subscribed over $40,000 to the Red Cross. Every city and hamlet in the State has its Red Cross Society, and all are working overtime.

In reading the names of the soldiers who were on the Tuscania you will recognize the names of many nationalities. The roster of our great National Army contains the names of almost all nationalities, all Americans, all united in one single purpose—that of winning the war—and inspired by one great motive, love and loyalty for their common country, America.

I ask leave, Mr. Speaker, to print as an extension of my remarks the names of the soldiers from the eighth congressional district who were on the Tuscania and those who lost their lives.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the list indicated. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The list is as follows:

Mr. STAFFORD. Would the gentleman have any objection if I should yield one minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, some time ago the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] received permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing an editorial by a distinguished Democratic editor. Now I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing in the RECORD the remarks of one who I think is the greatest living Democratic editor, the Hon. Henry Watterson, which appeared in last Saturday's Washington Post.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by making a part thereof the editorial referred to. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides nearly $70,000,000 for the expenses of the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the Government, a great proportion of which is for salaries in the executive departments in the city of Washington. The expenses of the executive departments in the city of Washington have grown enormously in the last year and promise to grow still more during the coming year. The pay roll in the city of Washington now is approximately $70,000,000 a year. Prior to the war it was about $50,000,000 a year. That money, of course, must be raised not only by taxation of the people but, in this emergency, by the sale of bonds. I have urged on this House, and expect to continue to urge upon it, the absolute, imperative necessity of getting an honest day's work for every dollar expended by Uncle Sam, and I am at a loss somewhat to see why the simple proposal to adopt a standard day of eight hours for the employees of the Government in the District of Columbia should raise such a tremendous objection as it has raised. It apparently finds opponents even on the floor of this House.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BORLAND. For a brief question.

Mr. LONDON. The gentleman has used the expression "a standard day of eight hours."

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. What does the gentleman mean by that expression, "a standard day"?

Mr. BORLAND. I will say to the gentleman from New York that my judgment is—and I hope that he can concur with me, that there is just as much an honest day's work as an honest dollar or an honest pound or an honest bushel. I would not deal with a merchant who tried to fix his own standard of what constituted a pound.

I would not deal with a man who attempted to tell me how many cents he would give me for a dollar or leave it as a matter of bargaining and chaffering between us, and I believe there is just as much an honest day's work as there is an honest dollar or an honest pound.

Mr. LONDON. The gentleman used the expression, "a standard day."

Mr. BORLAND. I want to answer my friend a little further. I have no sympathy with those people who claim that a day's work, is eight hours or less, how much less depending upon how shrewd one party to the trade may be and how helpless the other may be. I have just as little sympathy with them as I have for a man who says that he will get just as much out of the laborer as he can, or that the laborer is not to earn a living.

And there is just as much moral limit to one proposition as there is to the other, in my mind. I hope there is in the mind of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. LONDON. I tried to get a definition of the standard day, because I proceed upon the theory that an honest day's work means a day's work in which the man applies himself to the utmost of his ability to the task allotted to him.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman is now in the realm of fog. An honest day's work is the standard that is customarily fixed by the community. When you talk about what a man can efficiently apply himself to, that is mere fog. A merchant might say he would give as many ounces to the pound as his own aspirations required. I want to say that nobody is going to get the worst of that shifting scale any quicker than the laborer is going to get it. He has always got the worst of it when there is not a standard fixed by law.

If the value of a dollar is the matter of bargain in the market place, the poor man always gets the worst of it. If a pound is the matter of shrewdness of dealing, the poor always get the worst of it.

And if an honest day's work is not set by all the community, the poor and the unfortunate get the worst of it and the shrewd and powerful get the best of it. There is not a bit of doubt about that.

I do not think it is necessary for me to explain to the great majority of this House what is meant by an honest day's work. The only question is why have we not gotten the honest day's work from the employees of the Government in the District of Columbia? Cleared of all the technicalities that have been brought in here, all the shrewdness at the command of the people opposing this amendment, it is that it would cut $7,000,000 off of Uncle Sam's pay roll in the District of Columbia. The merchants and landlords of Washington will not submit to the loss of that revenue. That is sufficient answer for all the opposition. It is a square issue between the taxpayers of the Nation and the profiteers of Washington.

I want to read here a letter that I sent to the secretary of a labor union in my district, and I will ask the Clerk to read it from the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the same.

The Clerk read as follows:

FEBRUARY 23, 1918.

Mr. JAMES H. ANDERSON,
Secretary Central Labor Union, Labor Temple, Kansas City, Mo.

DEAR MR. ANDERSON: I have your letter of February 20 inclosing a set of resolutions adopted by the Central Labor Union February 9, 1918, in regard to the so-called Borland amendment. It seems clear that these resolutions were suggested by somebody in Washington, and I regret exceedingly that the unions in Kansas City have not had an opportunity to go into the facts of this matter a little more fully.

The overwhelming majority of the present National Army which our country is putting in the field to fight the great battle of democracy is composed of the sons of working men. The life of every one of these boys is as precious to his father as the life of the son of a millionaire. No department of our Government ought to fail to exercise the highest degree of vigilance and efficiency to support this Army in the field. Not one of these boys should be sacrificed by negligence or delay, and our Government and our President are anxious to have at this time the loyal cooperation of all of the Government employees. The President sticks to his post with unremitting fidelity. Congress is working hard and not measuring its hours of service. Men in the mechanical trades of the United States and the Government arsenals and shipyards are working a full eight hours and longer, and there is no reason why the clerks in the departments at Washington should continue to enjoy political privileges and favoritism.

It may mean the prolonging of this war and the sacrifice of thousands of working men's sons. It may mean many sad households in this land; many bereaved mothers, many widows and many fatherless children, most of whom will be among the class of the world's workers.

We are facing a vigilant and relentless foe, and the horrible thing about this disgraceful protest which the Washington clerks are making is that it does not ring true with the best and highest note of Americanism. It does not mean a nation in earnest to win this war at the least sacrifice of blood and treasure.

I am inclosing herewith some resolutions which I hope and trust will be more expressive of the real sentiments of your union. I wish you would read this letter and these resolutions at the next meeting of your body. With kindest regards, I remain,

Yours, very truly,

(Signed) WILLIAM P. BORLAND.

Mr. BORLAND. Ah, there is an answer, of course, as to why the clerks can not work more than seven hours a day. It is the $7,000,000 added to the Government pay roll for the benefit of the business men of Washington. That is always the answer that bobs up like Banquo's ghost. Do you talk about the boys in the field? Seven million dollars jingling in Washington will drown out the cries of the boys across the sea. You talk about the fatherless orphans and widows; $7,000,000 spent in the Nation's Capital would still the cries of the widows and orphans. Do you talk about winning the war for democracy? No. You are winning the war for the profiteers of the Nation's Capital. Seven million dollars added to the pay roll, and every man who gets on the floor of this House to oppose the eight-hour day is consciously or unconsciously talking for the $7,000,000 patriots in the city of Washington.

Now, having answered the sophistry to the effect that this is not in the interest of the laboring man, I want to answer another sophistry, that it is in the power now of the departments in Washington to require eight hours a day and that they are doing it. It is a sufficient answer to that to say that if they were doing it nobody would be injured by an eight-hour day, and there would not be any doubt about the matter. It is manifest the clerks are not putting in an eight-hour day or they would not object to the change.

But the law provides for a seven-hour day. Gentlemen have gotten up here very blandly and said that there was an eight-hour day provided for now. There is an eight-hour day provided for the mechanical laborers of the Government, but not for these clerical positions.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BORLAND. I can not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman listen to me?

Mr. BORLAND. I have listened to you a good while on the question of the shortage of labor on the farms, in which I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. FOCHT. The gentleman has not listened to me very much.

Mr. BORLAND. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. FOCHT. I want information. I do not want to take your time. At this juncture I would like to ascertain, speaking of that $7,000,000 less paid out, if that means you are going to reduce the wages $7,000,000?

Mr. BORLAND. I will explain that to the gentleman.

Mr. FOCHT. Also let me ask you this: At the present rate, if what has been said in regard to the employment of these 60,000 or more people that have been called to the city of Washington is true, they can scarcely exist, and how are you going to reduce their wages?

Mr. BORLAND. Why are you bringing them?

Mr. FOCHT. They are here and can not get home.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman from Pennsylvania consumed some time this afternoon. He talked about the shortage of labor on the farm. He knows the question of labor on the farm is a question of competition. He knows you can not get labor on the farm when a colored man can come down here to Washington and get $3 a day and sit in a revolving chair kicking his heels in front of an office door in one of these buildings.

The gentleman wants a seven-hour day for that employee. How are you going to get him back to the farm? And he will probably fight for an increase of wages for that employee, not realizing that he is putting his farmer friend up against further competition in the labor market.

Mr. FOCHT. Pardon me, but when you speak of what I would do, let me suggest that there are no colored laborers or any other laborers from my district coming to Washington so long as there are any left down South or out in the gentleman's district in Missouri. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORLAND. There are more Republican laborers, according to my observation, than Democrats in the District of Columbia. The gentleman would know that if he were in anywise familiar with the condition of the departments.

Now, I want to puncture this idea that an eight-hour day is already provided in the law. The statute reads:

Hereafter it shall be the duty of the heads of the executive departments, in the interest of the public service, to require of all clerks and other employees of whatever grade or class in their respective departments not less than seven hours of labor each day, except Sundays and days declared public holidays by law or Executive order: Provided, That the heads of departments may by special order, stating the reasons, further extend the hours for clerks or employees in their departments.

That provides for a seven-hour standard, and it can be exceeded by a special order, stating the reasons, in the case of each of these employees. Now, of course, there are bureaus in Washington where, by special order stating the reason, the time is exceeded to-day on account of war preparations, but 65 or 70 per cent of the civil-service employees in Washington are in bureaus where no special order could be issued stating any reason, and that is exactly the class of people we must reach.

The whole Commerce Department, the whole Labor Department, the whole Department of Justice—in fact, all of the departments, except a few bureaus in the Treasury and of the War and Navy Departments—are on a seven-hour basis, and as that is the standard fixed by law you can not change it, except by special order, stating the reason. Legislation by Congress is clearly necessary to remedy the abuse.

Now, my bill provides an eight-hour basis within the same limitations, namely, that you can not increase the hours without stating the reasons and a special order, and you have the standard of eight hours instead of a standard of seven hours, with the same limitations applying to it.

That disposes of all this talk as to whether there is or is not a standard eight-hour day or whether the departments have the power to grant it. In all the departments that are now working on a seven-hour basis they are using an excessive number of people. Those people ought to be put on an eight-hour basis, and the excess ought to be put in the War and Navy Departments, where they are needed, so that it would not be necessary to bring more people to the city of Washington, still further to aggravate the high prices that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] has spoken of.

The Civil Service Commission reports that in the last year 30,000 additional employees have been passed for Government service. They are not all on this bill. Many of them are in the sundry civil bill, because they are in what are called independent Government establishments. But the civil-service report shows that there are 30,000 additional employees. We had 37,000 here before the war began, so that we have approximately 67,000 now, or will have before the close of the fiscal year. We are taking those from the productive industries of the country.

Who is benefiting from this? The profiteers of Washington. Let us see if the man who is opposing this can even pose as the friend of the Government clerks. What self-respecting Government clerk ought to refuse to work eight hours a day? And if he did, what would he profit himself? What advantage to the individual clerk is there in having an excessive number of people on the Government's pay roll? None. It is a great disadvantage to him. In the first place, it does not put him in a very good light with his fellow citizens outside of the District of Columbia. In the second place, it clogs up the office and reduces his chances of promotion. In the third place, it reduces his chance for an adequate increase of salary as compensation for his services; and, in the fourth place, it practically destroys his chance of securing the enactment of a proper retirement law. So that the individual clerk is undoubtedly a loser by this agitation for a seven-hour-day proposition. Who is the gainer? The $7,000,000 patriots of the city of Washington; and every time you turn and look at this proposition from a new angle you get but one view, and that is the $7,000,000 padding of the Government pay roll for the benefit of the landlords and merchants of Washington. You can not prove that any individual in or out of the District of Columbia is benefited by a seven-hour day except these men who live off of the earnings of the clerks.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; I yield to my colleague.

Mr. COX. As to the salaries paid to Government clerks and the salaries paid by private employers, I want to say that a very bright young woman came into my office this week, a young woman from Indiana, whose husband had been in the Navy for nine years and is now in the war zone, either in England or in France, and has made an assignment to her of all he proposes to make.

She has a little girl three and a half years old. She sought employment in one of the leading department stores here in the city of Washington. Last July she got the munificent sum of $7 a week. She is now getting the magnificent sum of $9 a week, and she tells me that the average pay roll of the saleslaadies in this leading department store does not exceed $12.50 a week, working eight hours every day in the year, except Sunday. That is the true condition. Yet there is no question but what that department store is agitating increased payments to Government clerks.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. BORLAND. I will in just a moment. I want to say that what the gentleman from Pennsylvania has heard is mostly the clamor of the opposition. What I have said will find a very small space in the RECORD. In all the amount of brains that the $7,000,000 stake has produced, they have not dared to compare the scale of prices or the terms of service or the hours of service or the number of working days in the year in a single private industry in the whole District of Columbia, and in the District of Columbia are located the general offices of the American Federation of Labor. They have not compared our office force with that office force, either in terms of service or in pay. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I want to say right here only this: That to me the wages paid by private employers do not necessarily constitute the standard for the Government of the United States.

Mr. BORLAND. I should like to yield only for a question.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Many private employers pay niggardly wages, and the Government of the United States, which is the wealthiest employer in the world, ought always to pay a living wage regardless of what private employers pay.

Mr. BORLAND. I regret that the gentleman from Wisconsin, who, ordinarily, is very courteous, has not taken advantage of the courtesy I have extended to him to ask me a question instead of making a comment.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BORLAND. I refuse to yield now.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman think what is paid by private employers necessarily constitutes a fair criterion as to what the Government ought to pay?

Mr. BORLAND. Then the gentleman is condemning the American Federation of Labor, which is a private employer, with the same class of office force in the District of Columbia. Why, of course, what private employers pay is a criterion, because it fixes the standard of wages. What men pay in the market for potatoes fixes the price of potatoes. You can say the Government ought to pay more for potatoes, and perhaps that is a good argument if you have got potatoes to sell. What people will ordinarily pay for a thing under similar conditions or under the best conditions is the criterion.

Mr. COX. Was there not a strike in the city of Washington in the offices of the American Federation of Labor a couple of years ago?

Mr. BORLAND. On that very question—that the force down there, as I understand it, wanted the same hours of labor and the same pay as the Federation was demanding from the Federal Government, and the strikers did not get it. Now, I will ask the Clerk to read in my time a comment from a leading Democratic country newspaper in Missouri, one of the best-edited country newspapers in the State, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the Jackson Examiner, Independence, Mo.]

MICE IN THE MEAL BAG.

Congressman BORLAND has got a glimmer of the labor situation and it should be sufficient to let the light into other places which may be dark. Mr. BORLAND suggests that the thousands of clerks in the departments in Washington be required to work eight hours a day instead of seven, as now, and points out the fact that this additional hour would equal the employment of 6,000 or 8,000 additional clerks, relieve the congestion, and call upon the Washington employees of the Government for the same number of hours now recognized as a standard day by men employed, not by the employers, who often work eight hours before noon and eight hours after noon.

Mr. BORLAND'S slogan embodies the entire argument. He demands that an honest day's work be given for every day's pay handed out by Uncle Sam.

Our Member of Congress is absolutely correct. When every patriotic man and woman is straining to meet war emergency and not even looking at the time clock, when hundreds of men are working long hours for no pay at all and happy to make the sacrifice, the office clerks at Washington who do half a day's work may justly be denominated as slackers.

Mr. BORLAND. Oh, there is a reason. Seven million dollars added to the Government pay roll! There is a reason why the Government clerks must occupy that kind of a position before their fellow citizens. And scores of self-respecting clerks have come to me and said that they would be glad to submit to the eight-hour proposition to clear out the dead timber in the Government offices. I should not like to lose faith in human nature and denominate all Government clerks as slackers. Only those who oppose an eight-hour day are slackers.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

I would like to ask the gentleman this question: The increase of the hours of labor is equivalent to a reduction of salary?

Mr. BORLAND. That is rather an academic question, but not a hard one to answer. It is not equivalent to a reduction of salary at all. If a man is working on piecework, figuring the output of his labor, of course the increase of hours of work is a reduction of the price per unit; there is no question about that; but it is not a reduction when you are figuring on paying employees according to the cost of living in Washington and not the value of the services.

Mr. MORGAN. I have rather assumed that it was true that an increase of the hours of labor was equivalent to a reduction of salary. If that were true, would it not be inconsistent for Congress to increase the hours of labor and at the same time not increase the pay; would they not be working along two different lines?

Mr. BORLAND. I think the gentleman is right. I do not think we ought to increase the pay and not increase the hours of labor. But without the increase of wages we are paying them what is supposed to be full time, and we are not getting it. Instead of our demand for a noncompensated hour, we are being short changed, and the taxpayers are paying for it.

Now, who is going to win on this proposition? The profiteers! Everybody has friends except the taxpayer, and his friends are not numerous, especially in the city of Washington. Nobody who lives in Washington cares anything about the taxpayer except that he is the cow to be milked. But I say the taxpayer is entitled to a full day's work, and we are entitled to fix the salary at what we think is a full day's pay.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. How old is the law under which they work seven hours?

Mr. BORLAND. It was a war measure passed in 1898. At that time a day's work in the departments here was not more than four, five, or six hours. Up to 1898 the clerks worked four to six hours, as they saw fit. When the war came on in 1898 and the country was facing a foreign foe as it is to-day, it became necessary, as it is now, to get more efficiency, and Congress fixed the number of hours at seven. They had a battle to do it, and we are going through the same battle. I suppose that seven hours was a compromise because it was too big a jump from four hours to eight hours a day. The $7,000,000 patriots—they probably were $2,000,000 patriots then, as they have prospered doubtless since—fought the thing down to seven hours.

Mr. LONDON. Has the head of any department now affected by the seven-hour law asked to have a change in the law?

Mr. BORLAND. Now, my friend, I am going to be excused from answering that kind of a question. I could tell the gentleman some interesting facts, but I am not going to do it on the floor of the House.

Mr. LONDON. That is a legitimate question.

Mr. BORLAND. There is only one Cabinet officer who has taken the open position against it, and it is not hard to guess who that gentleman is.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. I would like to have the gentleman state whether he has considered this fact: The Government is having some difficulty in getting clerks. Now, I have in mind the fact that comparatively short hours are an inducement to a young man or a young woman to enter the Government service, and while at first it may seem an advantage it is of some disadvantage. Does not the gentleman think that the Government would secure better service, better talent, with the comparatively short hours than with long hours?

Mr. BORLAND. I think the gentleman is right about the short hours and the many holidays having coaxed a great many people here from the farming community he represents, and made it exceedingly difficult for his constituents to cultivate their farms. The gentleman is entirely right and I agree with him in that whether I agree with him in the idea of helping his constituents or not. It happens that I have only sixty-one hundred farmers in my district, and some very good ones who appreciate the value of service.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. In a minute, I want to answer the second part of the gentleman's question and then I have finished with the gentleman. If we were paying for only seven hours as a basis of pay of a clerk with an 85-cent dollar the gentleman's contention would be right. If a man comes down here too feeble to work eight hours a day, so mentally feeble that he can not stand the ordinary strain and would like to get a job and take it for 85 cents on the dollar, Uncle Sam can do business with him, but I would not. Uncle Sam could hire him and pay him 85 cents on the dollar.

But that is not what you are getting. You are paying for 16 ounces to the pound and getting only 14. That is the trouble with the gentleman, and the gentleman's farmer friend is paying the bill. The money that is being paid out by the American public is going to the merchants and landlords of the District of Columbia, $7,000,000 of it. I want the gentleman to remember this when he gets back home—$7,000,000 of the farmers' money in Oklahoma goes into this proposition, and none of it ever goes back to Oklahoma.

Mr. MORGAN. If there are soft snaps at the National Capital I want to see the farmers come here and get them. I do not sympathize with the idea that it is wrong for the farmer boy to come to Washington either as a clerk or as a Member of Congress.

Mr. BORLAND. I am glad the gentleman feels that way about it. I do not believe that the farms of Oklahoma, however, ought to be abandoned to bring the people down here to work seven hours a day when they are not needed. If the gentleman thinks the farmers of Oklahoma want to work 12 hours a day to pay taxes to support seven-hour clerks in Washington he had better ask them. I would not even want to see the farms of Pennsylvania abandoned, because there might not then be enough voters left to return my genial friend to Congress.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Oklahoma does not think that these people ought to work just seven hours a day and have these farmers pay for it?

Mr. MORGAN. He seems to think that.

Mr. QUIN. Oh, my goodness, there must be a mistake about that.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. Then, let me ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. BORLAND. That was a mere pleasantry.

Mr. FOCHT. I am sure my dear friend from Missouri has not answered, and being from Missouri he ought to be able to answer it and to give us the information. The gentleman has failed to tell us how you are going to save the $7,000,000 by making the clerks work one hour more, unless you discharge some of them.

Mr. BORLAND. I can only furnish the argument. I can not furnish the comprehension. Who is getting the benefit of this? Is the taxpayer of the United States getting the benefit? We know that the laboring man is not getting the benefit, the individual clerk is not getting the benefit, union labor is not getting the benefit, the farmer is not getting the benefit. Perhaps the taxpayer is getting the benefit. Perhaps he is going to get so much better work out of these employees by having them work only seven hours a day, and they are going to do such splendid service in those seven hours a day, they are going to make such a brilliant record, that that will be his pay. That, however, has not been the estimate of men who came down here and investigated the situation. Why is it that they resent the report and work of the Efficiency Bureau that would tend to reduce the number of men in each department and expedite business? Every business man who has ever looked into the situation has said that he could take 60 per cent of the clerks and do better work than is now being done; but the whole cumbersome system of excessive employees and the entire red tape which has embarrassed the Government is due to what? The pressure of $7,000,000 patriots in the city of Washington.

You can not make a reform here without submitting yourself to the most revolting torrent of filth and abuse that can be concocted by the human mind. I do not want to make any personal reference, because legislation is never a personal matter to me, but that is the situation exactly. No man can even suggest a reform in these departments without making it so personally unpleasant that very few men like to undertake it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. BORLAND. How about the soldier in the field? I expect the friends of the clerks will claim that he is benefited by this seven-hour proposition. How about the soldier's mother, who is anxiously praying every night that the Government may nerve its arm to this great struggle, and that it may be soon over, and that her boy may come back home again? She would not call her boy back. No; that is not in the heart of the American mother. She is glad that he was willing to go and able to go and that he did go; she is glad that he wanted to go and do a real man's part. Think of the gall and wormwood that would have been in that mother's heart if her boy did not want to go and if he could not be made to go. Suppose his highest ambition was a seven-hour job in Washington and he did not want to serve his country and his flag? Suppose he wanted to—

> Be carried to the skies on flowery beds of ease,
> While others fought to win the prize and sailed through bloody seas?

The heart of the whole world goes out in love and reverence to the mother of a hero, but God pity the mother of a slacker!

That mother may turn for help in her suffering to her God; she will get nowhere else sympathy in her shame and suffering. Does the mother of a soldier who is wearing the khaki uniform ask for a seven-hour day in Washington? Ah, no; she wants this Government to be vigilant, alert; she wants it to win this great cause of democracy. She does not want a single American boy sacrificed upon the altar of political cowardice or political incompetency. She wants every precious American hero's life that is laid upon the altar of his country to count for the great cause of democracy. There is only one way now to do that, and that is for all of us to do our full share. All the sacrifices of this war must not fall upon the boys who go to the trenches. There is a large measure of sacrifice for those of us who stay behind.

The business man is bearing his, the taxpayer is bearing his, the farmer is bearing his, the father is bearing his, the mother is baring her breast to the sharpest arrows of fate; she would gladly give her own life if she could bring her boy back safe. None of these people are asking for a seven-hour day in Washington. No; that is being asked for by the $7,000,000 patriots of Washington. Can any man in this assembly go back home and face an audience composed of fathers and mothers of true American stock, fathers and mothers of boys who are defending the Old Flag upon a foreign field, and tell them that he voted for a seven-hour day in Washington for the convenience of the clerks? Can he tell them that he voted for a seven-hour day because of technicalities in the wording of the law? Can he tell them that he voted for a seven-hour day because of the insistent demand of the $7,000,000 patriots of the District of Columbia? I credit this House with saying, "No"; that no man will dare or find it in his conscience or his heart to vote for a seven-hour day for the clerks in Washington and leave the father and the mother of the soldier in the field without the vigilant service of the Government to which he is entitled. Gentlemen, I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to take up much time of the committee this afternoon, but I do want to call attention to the fact that the usual spring drive of the Committee on Appropriations is on against the Subtreasuries of the land. On page 63 of the bill, under the heading "Independent Treasury," there is the following provision:

> The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to discontinue the offices of the assistant treasurers at Baltimore, Boston, Chicago, Cincinnati, New Orleans, New York, Philadelphia, St. Louis, and San Francisco within six months after the President shall have proclaimed the termination of the existing state of war between the United States and Germany.

Mr. Chairman, again the city of Baltimore becomes the center of an attack upon its Subtreasury, although this time it is coupled with the other Subtreasury cities of the land, in which it is provided all the Subtreasuries be discontinued within six months after the war. At no time in the history of that great metropolis of the South has there been a time more inopportune for a change of any of its financial institutions or systems. I have frequently told the House Baltimore during the last few years has progressed in population, in manufactures, and in business generally to an unprecedented extent.

The great Bethlehem Steel Co., which acquired what is known as the Sparrows Point Mills slightly more than a year ago, is rapidly expending some $50,000,000 in the enlargement of its plant, the extension of its territory, and the employment of several thousand additional laborers. The great section to the south of Baltimore Harbor known as Curtis Bay is rapidly expanding so that now some $40,000,000 has been invested within the last few years in the construction of large industries and the enlargement of those which were there originally, together with the erection of houses for the additional laborers employed.

To such an extent has this development grown that now to the east of it what is known as Curtis Creek, another favored inland harbor, has taken a great step forward. A large shipyard will soon be in operation at this point. The land has been purchased and full development will soon begin.

Perhaps the greatest and more important development at this point is the immense storage warehouses of the Ordnance Bureau of the War Department. This bureau has purchased at that point 900 acres of land upon which there is now being erected immense warehouses for the storage, pending shipment, of war munitions.

That harbor, already 25 feet deep, is now being dredged to a depth sufficient to accommodate the largest ships which must carry these munitions to France. This operation is perhaps one of the largest upon which the Government is now working, and it is expected that it will be completed within the next four months. The buildings are not like those of the cantonments, but are more substantial, and will no doubt be utilized for many years to come.

Just below the city of Baltimore, at what is known as Canton, on the Colgate Creek Branch of the Patapsco River, is now under construction immense machine and repair shops, to which will be brought automobiles, truck, and other things of that nature to be assembled, crated, and shipped abroad. To it will also be brought the damaged trucks for repairs and reshipment. It is contemplated that the Government will employ not less than 2,000 men at this point.

A large number of shipyards have sprung up in and around our city, and only a few days ago it was announced through the press that a company owning 1,300 acres of land on the south side of our harbor, just east of Curtis Creek, where the large storage warehouses are being erected, with a capitalization of $5,000,000, was negotiating with the Government for the construction of a number of ships for European service.

Just south of our city about 17 miles is Camp Meade, one of the cantonments established by the War Department for the training of selected men. There are now at that point some 40,000 soldiers and all the necessary help and attendants required for an immense force of that character. Other camps, much smaller, of course, than Camp Meade, are stationed within a short distance of Baltimore. I make mention in particular of that located at Saunders Range, 12 miles from the city; Fort McHenry, which is rapidly being developed into a hospital, and where the modern and up-to-date immigration buildings are to be converted and used for hospital purposes; Fort Howard and Locust Point, where many soldiers belonging to the Coast Artillery Corps, guard the docks, wharves, and munition works of the city; while north of the city is the proving grounds, now employing a vast number of workmen.

This great assemblage of soldiers, development of industries, enlargement of plants, and all those things which necessarily attend the growth of such concerns have sprung up in and around our city within the last two or three years. It will be seen, therefore, that at this time, when business and war necessities require so much money, such great time and energy of every man and woman, the least thing to be desired is anything which will in any wise affect our financial system or jar or disrupt its organization; and this situation will certainly not change within six months after the war.

The Subtreasury of Baltimore was established in 1846, some 72 years ago, so that all of our financial institutions have sprung up in and around this Subtreasury and our people have become accustomed to its presence and to the advantages of such an institution. The Bureau of Efficiency has recommended the suspension of the Subtreasury system, and that the duties of same be placed with the banks and Federal Reserve System now established. The bureau, however, recommends or suggests that the change be postponed until the war is over and normal conditions are again approximated. The bureau further states that it would be possible without confusion to close three of the smaller Subtreasuries at once—Baltimore, Philadelphia, and Cincinnati.

Baltimore does not want any more experiments. It is not proud of the way it has been treated in reference to the Federal reserve bank. It feels that it has been compelled to do business, as it were, uphill, transacting business with Richmond so much farther south and a much smaller city than itself, whereas it should be transacting business with a Federal reserve bank established in Baltimore itself, or with those of Philadelphia or New York, where most of its large financial transactions are carried on. I am not complaining of Richmond, nor am I complaining of its people in wanting a Federal reserve bank at that point, but the point I want to make is that Baltimore has not been given the advantages it should be given for a city of its size.

Every city of the size or larger than Baltimore has a Subtreasury and a Federal reserve bank as well. A Federal reserve branch bank was opened in Baltimore to-day, but even in this instance we are not to have a Baltimorean to head it, but a man is to be brought from Richmond and placed at its head. You might suppose that this is being done because a man of experience is wanted, a man who has been engaged in Federal reserve bank work, but when you know that a Baltimorean was sent to Richmond to head the Federal reserve bank and made the greatest success of that bank of all of the system, you can readily perceive that Baltimore can furnish just as good men to head the Federal reserve branch bank as can be brought forward from anywhere in the country. We are glad to have the Federal reserve branch bank, but do you not see that doing business with a branch bank which must report and obtain its authority from the parent bank at Richmond, can not be as satisfactory as having a Federal reserve bank itself in our city. We are glad to have this branch bank, and will give it every support.

All we are asking for the expense and conduct of the Subtreasury at Baltimore is $31,500—a small amount, indeed, when you consider the advantage it is to the commercial and financial institutions of our city. When you realize that with this small appropriation the Subtreasury at Baltimore is doing a business aggregating some $314,000,000, an increase of $90,000,000 over last year, as is shown by the table I hereto attach, I am sure one will readily realize its worth.

Cash received and disbursed, 1917.

February	$20,136,755
March	18,247,192
April	20,365,815
May	21,394,096
June	23,756,967
July	25,216,882
August	26,244,554
September	30,307,269
October	31,666,937
November	29,274,221
December	33,961,408
January (1918)	33,736,636
	314,308,732

Increase of $90,000,000 over previous year.

We ask, Mr. Chairman, that the Subtreasury at Baltimore be not molested, and we ask not only for Baltimore but for all the Subtreasury cities as well. We realize that during this immense war in which we are now engaged the slightest interruption in financial affairs will vitally affect the whole community. Baltimore, as I have said, has enjoyed the advantages and the benefits of this Subtreasury for almost three-quarters of a century. Its business men, as I have said before in this House, comprise the large packing industries of our State, which need immense quantities of small change, as do all the other financial and commercial enterprises of our State, and they depend upon the Subtreasury in our city in these matters, wherein it has served them for so many years.

We do not know what advantage and just what power and benefit the Federal reserve branch bank will be to our city. It may be that after we have had that institution for a while we will find that it fulfills all the duties of the Subtreasury and that we have no use for the latter. Let us hope that it will more than perform those duties and that it will be even a greater advantage to our people than the present Subtreasury, with its efficient employees. But we are not impressed with the fact that it is a branch bank. We realize that a branch bank must necessarily report and receive its authority from the parent bank. While it may be true that it will fill all the duties of the Subtreasury, yet our people have not yet been convinced. They do not know. They have not had the opportunity of doing business with it. They have not become accustomed to its mode of doing business. When they do, when it meets all the requirements necessary, and not until then should an effort be made to suspend our Subtreasury, and no law in advance of such test should be enacted.

We do not want anything to happen at this time which will interfere with the immense business we are doing nor which will disturb or inconvenience any of our citizens. We are doing our part in this great war; we are making our contributions to every claim that is made upon us; we are meeting each and every obligation as it is brought to our attention, and it is certainly as little as this great Government can do to let us alone while we are so busily engaged in so many necessary enterprises and in winning this war.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I will yield to the gentleman for a question, but I prefer that he would allow me to finish, and then I will be glad to yield, as I will not occupy very much more time.

The vast business enterprises which I have enumerated, the great Government works which have been established in and around our metropolis, the requirements of our people, the universal strain under which each and every man of our community and every other community is now laboring should tell us that this is certainly not the time to even discuss, much less suspend, the Subtreasury at Baltimore or to place it in suspense.

Let us finish this war, try out the branch bank, enact additional legislation to enable the branch bank to perform the duties of the Subtreasury, and then take up the question of the suspension of the Subtreasury. Do not establish a "Damocles sword" over the Subtreasuries of the land.

You men of other cities who are enjoying the advantages of a Subtreasury and likewise a Federal reserve bank can readily see and understand my reasons for asking that this action be not taken. I hope, therefore, that when this matter is brought before the House that it will be promptly voted down and that we shall be left this valuable institution that we need so badly.

The great necessity for transportation occasioned by the present war has crowded the port of New York, the port of Boston is jammed, and Philadelphia has as much as it can accommodate, and Baltimore has a very considerable part of the business. But we are fortunate in having an unlimited amount of space for harbor purposes and water-front manufacture. Twelve miles from the Chesapeake Bay to Baltimore one can find innumerable places suitable for factories with water frontage. In this area and with the number of rivers and harbors entering the bay we can accommodate any quantity of business, so that we must look not only to the present as the great commercial and business welfare of Baltimore, but we must look to the future when much of the water-borne commerce of the Nation must be carried through the port of Baltimore. If the ports become so very congested that it will be absolutely impossible to accommodate them they can make use of this wonderful location we have for manufactures, shipbuilding, and various enterprises which should be along a water front.

I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I wanted to say a year ago I voted for the elimination of these Subtreasuries under the understanding that when we passed the Federal reserve act that the Federal Reserve System was to take care of the work that they were doing. I had a good deal of protest from Cincinnati for having thus voted, and I am still concerned about whether there is any real need of a Subtreasury with the branch-bank system in vogue.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The branch-bank system legislation has not been passed which gave them the work of the Subtreasuries. It may be all right when the proper legislation is passed and when we have authorized this branch-bank system, but I do not think we ought to put these institutions into effect pending the trial of the branch-bank system and until the proper legislation is passed.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I will.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman from Ohio will procure the report from the Bureau of Efficiency, provided for in the last legislative bill, he will find the reason why they all ought to be abolished.

Mr. LINTHICUM. That is the opinion of the Bureau of Efficiency, but if that bureau had gone to Baltimore and saw how this institution is connected with all the financial institutions of Baltimore and what a great service is being performed, they would think that the sum of $31,500 for the amount of work done is very small indeed.

Mr. COX. The gentleman would not think that the banks of Baltimore are entitled to preference over the banks of Pittsburgh or Richmond?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Every city in the land as large as Baltimore has a Federal reserve bank in it and Baltimore has none.

And, moreover, when they opened a branch bank they went to Richmond to get the president, although we have a man in Baltimore who was president of the Federal reserve bank in Richmond, and made it the most successful reserve bank of the whole country. I do not want to say that he wanted this position, because he did not, inasmuch as he resigned from the one in Richmond. But I merely state that to show we have men who can take the presidency of this institution. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland makes a similar request. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10358) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

USELESS PAPERS IN EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report by Mr. TALBOTT (H. Rept. 351) from the Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments, which was ordered printed and filed.

RIVERS AND HARBORS.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors I desire to report the river and harbor bill (H. R. 10069, H. Rept. 350), and I also submit minority views of a member of the committee, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], and ask that they also be printed; but the minority views are to be printed separately.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina reports the river and harbor bill, together with his report and the report of the minority, which are to be printed separately.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, March 2, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. CRAGO, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 667) for the relief of Jeremiah Stover, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 347), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 3090) for the relief of Clement H. Cole, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 348), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2492) to establish the military record of Marshall M. Pool, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 349), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

SENATE.

SATURDAY, March 2, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, in time of our national peril we think most of the spiritual qualities of our men, and we look to Thee for that divine ministry that can heighten, refine, and glorify the qualities of manhood that are consecrated to the highest ideals of a Christian civilization. Grant that in this Senate and in all the departments of Government we may hold as our most sacred trust those high ideals of hearts that love God and love humanity and that work together for the establishment of Thy truth among men. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

RAILROAD CONTROL—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I ask that two additional members of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 3732) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes, be appointed on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and names as additional conferees on the part of the Senate the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 92) providing additional time for the payment of purchase money under homestead entries within the former Colville Indian Reservation, Wash., with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 9903. An act to provide for restoration to their former grades of enlisted men discharged to accept commissions, and for other purposes;

H. R. 9571. An act to authorize the appointment of officers of the Philippine Scouts as officers in the militia or other locally created armed forces of the Philippine Islands drafted into the service of the United States, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 10027. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, a telegram was submitted yesterday by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and some comments were made on it by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. It had to do with the matter of shipments of fruits and vegetables. I have received somewhat similar telegrams bearing on the same subject, and I submit one and ask to have it printed in the RECORD. There seems to be an ample production of vegetables and that sort of thing, but the difficulty seems to be to get them to market. I present this telegram as an illustration of those I am getting on the subject, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LEESBURG, FLA., March 1, 1918.

Hon. D. U. FLETCHER,
Washington, D. C.:

The South has been urged to grow foodstuff. We have answered the call and now have plenty of early vegetables, lettuce, cabbage, etc., which have been produced at great expense for fertilizer, seed, and labor. On account of slow transportation these perishable goods arrive at destination practically worthless, taking from 9 to 15 days from here to New York. Our Nation needs this produce. Can you not assist us by taking the matter of quick transportation up with Messrs. Hoover and McAdoo?

J. C. LEE,
President Leesburg City Council.

Mr. GRONNA. I have several resolutions adopted by the Sweet Clover Grange, No. 635, of Valleyford, Wash. The resolutions set forth very vividly and very clearly, I think, some facts as they exist. I wish to have the resolutions printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas our country is at war and the Nation is in need of extraordinary supplies of food, clothing, fuel, minerals, and lumber to maintain our Army and to succor our allies; and

Whereas it devolves upon the laboring class of our country to furnish the man power of the Army and Navy and to produce the necessary supplies in raw material and manufactured articles for ourselves and our allies; and

Whereas to a very great degree the burden falls upon the farmers of the Nation to furnish the men and material to win this war; and

Whereas our Government has called upon all producers of foodstuff to put forth every effort to the end that a maximum supply may be had; and

Whereas our Chief Executive has seen fit and through an act of Congress has been empowered to regulate prices on all commodities, even to the taking over and operating of the railroads, mines, and factories, at his discretion, in order to get better results through efficient service and the elimination of waste, even to the regulation of the profits that may be allowed to obtain; and

Whereas the Executive has seen fit to exercise his prerogative in the setting of a price on the farmers' wheat and also endeavors to maintain a relative value on hogs through the Food Administrator; and

Whereas the Food Administrator, acting through and under authority vested in him through the Executive, has at the same time endeavored to have the manufacturing and other corporate interests of the country to agree to and undertake to maintain through patriotic principles certain low, definite profits; and

Whereas these manufacturing and corporate interests have in most instances not only failed to cooperate in maintaining the basis of profit and lower prices for their product as agreed, but have in many cases openly violated the confidence and trust placed in them by the administration and wantonly boosted the prices of foodstuff and manufactured articles to such an extent as to not only place a burden on the producing classes through the inequitable condition thus created, but also have actually curtailed the productiveness of labor and also the food production by causing the disposition of breeding stock through the unwarranted prices charged for feed, making it impossible in many instances to even get feed for maintenance of such animals; and

Whereas it is necessary for the farmers of the Nation to resort to power machinery (to replace the man power taken from the farm to bear arms) in order to produce the food necessary for the successful prosecution of the war; and

Whereas the price of farm machinery has been advanced to as much as 30 per cent in some instances since the price was set on wheat and hogs: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That Sweet Clover Grange, of Spokane County, Wash., hereby protests against these unfair conditions and respectfully calls the attention of our Food Administrator and the National Council of Defense to the fact that the millers of the Nation are taking a profit of approximately $1 per barrel over the 25 cents agreed upon for the milling of flour, and that manufacturers of farm implements and power machinery are demanding prices up to 30 per cent more now than they did August 1, 1917, and this, too, in face of the fact that prices of steel and iron have been forced down by Federal regulation on an average of approximately 60 per cent in the same time; and be it further

Resolved, That we not only protest against this unpatriotic practice by big business, but that it is also a great hindrance to the farmer in his undertaking of feeding the world and, if allowed to continue, will work out to the very great disadvantage of the Nation in feeding and clothing its Army and Navy; and be it further

Resolved, That in allowing these corporations to extort from the farmer in this manner, after having set a price on what the farmer has to sell, is not only unjust, but a discrimination, and not in accordance with the laws of our country and the Constitution of the United States, but is foreign to democratic principles of government: Therefore be it further

Resolved, That inasmuch as the man power of the Nation has been conscripted to win the war for the Nation, and in order that producers may not be called upon to fight out the financial cost of the war after the war has been won by it, we demand that all wealth be conscripted, beginning with $250,000, and so graduated on a 5 per cent basis as to take all wealth in excess of $500,000, personally, either in private or corporate enterprises, and that all profits accruing either to private individuals or corporations be fully conscripted by the National Government; and that the income tax be so amended that all incomes, from whatever source, in excess of $5,000 a year be taxed 100 per cent, leaving the present rate of income tax on all incomes of $5,000 or less; and that we condemn the practice of the Government control of industries on a guaranteed basis of profits as unfair and not democratic, inasmuch as wealth is not thus called upon to contribute to war necessities to the point of sacrifice, as is labor.

[SEAL.] SWEET CLOVER GRANGE, No. 635.
MRS. ELLA E. STANLEY, Secretary.

VALLEYFORD, WASH.

Mr. GRONNA presented a petition of North Dakota Branch, Railway Mail Association, of Grand Forks, N. Dak., praying for an increase in salaries of railway mail clerks during the period of the war, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of the congregation of the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Starkweather, N. Dak., remonstrating against the use of foodstuffs in the manufacture of alcoholic drinks, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Cando, N. Dak., praying for the repeal of the present zone-system rates on second-class mail matter, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. NELSON presented a resolution adopted by the City Council of Minneapolis, Minn., favoring the fixing of prices on all foodstuffs and other products essential to the prosecution of the war, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. TILLMAN presented a resolution adopted at a meeting of the farmers of Lexington County, S. C., relative to the scarcity of labor on the farms and requesting that some means be adopted to relieve the present situation, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2120) for the relief of the Wisconsin Band of Pottawatomie Indians, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 293) thereon.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3011) for the relief of Winfield S. Solomon, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 294) thereon.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 4005) providing for the survey of public lands remaining unsurveyed in any of the surveying districts of Florida, with a view of satisfying the grant in aid of schools made to said State under the act of March 3, 1845, and other acts amendatory thereof; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. JONES of New Mexico:

A bill (S. 4006) for the relief of Capt. H. C. Smith; and

A bill (S. 4007) for the relief of Bernard S. Rodey; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 4008) granting a pension to Arthur H. Loomis; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 4009) granting an increase of pension to Magna Samson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. TILLMAN:

A bill (S. 4010) to promote the efficiency of the Navy, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 4011) relating to admission to the United States Naval Academy; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. OWEN:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 135) to exempt from the draft skilled labor on the farm during the year 1918; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ALSACE-LORRAINE.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a statement by Foreign Minister Pichon, in which he refers to certain documents bearing upon the German Government taking over Alsace-Lorraine. It is a very important historical statement by Minister Pichon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GERMAN DETERMINATION TO FORCE WAR ON FRANCE AND TRUE REASON FOR LORRAINE'S SEIZURE REVEALED—FOREIGN MINISTER PICHON BARES DOCUMENTS OF HOLLWEG AND EMPEROR WILLIAM I—FORMER ORDERED DEMAND FOR TOUL AND VERDUN IF FRENCH STAYED NEUTRAL—OLD KAISER WROTE TO EUGENIE THAT HE TOOK ALSACE-LORRAINE TO PREVENT THEM BEING A "JUMPING-OFF PLACE."

PARIS, March 1.

Two historic documents, one showing the German Government's determination to force war upon France and the other setting forth the reasons which induced Germany to take Alsace-Lorraine, were made public to-day by Stephen Pichon, the French foreign minister. The minister was speaking at the Sorbonne upon the anniversary of the protest made by representatives of the national assembly of Alsace-Lorraine against annexation to Germany.

"I will establish by documents," said M. Pichon, "that the day the Germans deliberately rendered inevitable the most frightful of wars they tried to dishonor us by the most cowardly complicity in the ambush into which they drew Europe. I will establish it in the revelation of a document that the German chancellor, after having drawn up, preserved carefully, and you will see why, in the most profound mystery of the most secret archives.

SIGNED BY BETHMANN-HOLLWEG.

"We have known only recently of its authenticity, and it defies any sort of attempt to disprove it. It bears the signature of Bethmann-Hollweg, German imperial chancellor at the outbreak of the war, and the date July 31, 1914. On that day Von Schoen, German ambassador in France, was charged by a telegram from his chancellor to notify us of a state of danger of war with Russia and to ask us to remain neutral, giving us 18 hours in which to reply.

"What was unknown until to-day was that the telegram of the German chancellor containing these instructions terminated with these words:

"'If the French Government declares it will remain neutral, your excellency will be good enough to declare that we must, as a guaranty of its neutrality, require the handing over of the fortresses of Toul and Verdun; that we will occupy them and will restore them after the end of the war with Russia. A reply to this last question must reach here before Saturday afternoon at 4 o'clock.'

GERMANY'S "SELF-DEFENSE."

"That," said M. Pichon, "is how Germany wanted peace at the moment when she declared war. That is how sincere she was in pretending that we obliged her to take up arms for her defense. That is the price she intended to make us pay for our baseness if we had had the infamy to repudiate our signature as Prussia repudiated hers by tearing up the treaty that guaranteed the neutrality of Belgium.

"Our mortal enemy in the war of 1871, Von Moltke, declared on the morrow of the treaty of Frankfort," added M. Pichon, on taking up the question of Alsace-Lorraine, "that it would require no less than 50 years to wean the heart of her lost Provinces from France."

M. Pichon contrasted the German acceptance then that the Provinces were in reality French with the reiterated pretensions of German statesmen since, especially the assertions of former Chancellor Bethmann-Hollweg and the present chancellor, Count von Hertling, that most of the Provinces were always German.

WORDS OF WILLIAM I.

The foreign minister made public for the first time the full text of a letter written by William I, the grandfather of the present German Emperor, to Empress Eugenie. The letter is dated Versailles, October 26, 1870.

"After the immense sacrifices for her defense," read M. Pichon, "Germany desires to be assured that the next war will find her better prepared to repel the aggression upon which we can count as soon as France shall have repaired her forces and gained allies. This is the melancholy consideration alone and not a desire to augment my country, whose territory is sufficiently great, that obliges me to insist upon the cession of territories that has no other object than to throw back to the starting point the French armies that, in the future, will come to attack us."

HERTLING'S CLAIMS DESTROYED.

After reading this passage M. Pichon asked:

"Can one better destroy the legend Von Hertling tries to establish that the annexation of Alsace-Lorraine had for its origin in the minds of its authors the wish to return to Germany German Provinces of which she had been dispossessed by French usurpation?"

The foreign minister pointed out that Prince von Bismarck in subsequent conversations with the Marquis de Gabriac, the French chargé d'affaires at Berlin, confirmed what his sovereign had written in his own hand. M. Pichon then cited the words of Frederick II when entering Silesia: "I take possession first. I shall always find pedants to prove my right," and M. Pichon added:

KNOWN AS FRENCH.

"But the rights of the German over our Provinces have never been proved by any pedant, because it can not be done." M. Pichon recalled that from the time of Louis XIV Alsace-Lorraine had been generally known as French, and he quoted the words of Gen. Maximilien Foy, 150 years later, when he said:

"'If ever the love of all that is great and generous weakens in the hearts of the inhabitants of old France, it will be necessary that they cross the Vosges, come to Alsace and temper again their patriotism and their energy.'

"What was true under the restoration," added M. Pichon, "is none the less true now."

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 1st instant approved and signed the act (S. 3389) to authorize and empower the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation to purchase, lease, requisition, or otherwise acquire, and to sell or otherwise dispose of improved or unimproved land, houses, buildings, and for other purposes.

COLVILLE INDIAN RESERVATION, WASH.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 92) providing additional time for the payment of purchase money under homestead entries within the former Colville Indian Reservation, Wash., which were, on page 1, line 4, after "of," to insert "not longer than"; on page 1, line 11, to strike out all after "purposes" down to and including the word "manner," in line 13; on page 2, line 2, to strike out "last"; on page 2, line 6, to strike out "four" and insert "five"; and on page 2, line 11, to strike out all after the word "extended" down to and including the word "extended," in line 13.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I move that the Senate concur to the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

H. R. 9903. An act to provide for restoration to their former grades of enlisted men discharged to accept commissions, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 9571. An act to authorize the appointment of officers of the Philippine Scouts as officers in the militia or other locally created armed forces of the Philippine Islands drafted into the service of the United States, and for other purposes.

H. R. 10027. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

WAR FINANCE CORPORATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, Senate bill 3714.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3714) to provide further for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to ask my colleague if he will let me call up the conference report on House bill 6361, known as the soldiers and sailors' civil rights bill. I do not think there is any objection at all to it. The only change made by the conference report is as to verbiage.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am willing to lay the unfinished business aside for 5 or even 10 minutes if necessary for the consideration of the conference report; but if the debate upon it should require a longer time, I feel that I should insist on the regular order.

Mr. OVERMAN. If it takes longer than 10 minutes, I will let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

SOLDIERS AND SAILORS' CIVIL RIGHTS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the conference report on the bill (H. R. 6361) to extend protection to the civil rights of members of the Military and Naval Establishments of the United States engaged in the present war.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the conference report. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, what changes have been made in the report?

Mr. OVERMAN. Practically no changes except some of verbiage. There has been no material change made.

Mr. REED. With that statement I have no objection to agreeing to the report.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me ask the Senator from North Carolina, does it deal with the question of a soldier's moratorium?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; this is a moratorium bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I wish to ask whether the bill includes any exemptions of a soldier from filing an income-tax return while he is in the Army and away from his home in the service of the country?

Mr. OVERMAN. There is no provision in the bill about that at all.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does not the Senator think that a word or two for that purpose could with perfect propriety be placed in a law of this kind?

Mr. OVERMAN. It could not be done on this bill, because this is only a conference report.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me ask the Senator, the acting chairman of the Judiciary Committee, what is the situation in which a soldier finds himself who is in the service and unable because of his absence from home to obtain any data which would enable him to make a return?

Mr. OVERMAN. The Secretary of the Treasury has a right to extend the time. It can be done by regulations of the department, I understand.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The time has been extended 30 days already to all citizens, but it seems to me a soldier who is in France or a soldier in any other part of the world ought not to be amenable to the penalty which would ordinarily follow because of his inability to make an income-tax return.

Mr. OVERMAN. I agree with the Senator; but that matter was not called to our attention, and it could not, of course, come up on this conference report. I think there is no question but what the Secretary of the Treasury or the President would be able to extend the time. It has been extended for 30 days, and they can extend it for 12 months or whatever period they deem necessary.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is this a final agreement on the bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. It is.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It would not be appropriate to ask that the conferees might take up that phase?

Mr. OVERMAN. No; that could not be done in conference.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But I have been here long enough, and so has the Senator, to know many things get into conference reports that have not been, strictly speaking, submitted to Congress. However, I ask for no irregularity. I simply desired to emphasize the fact that soldiers who are amenable to the income-tax law can not comply with the law and should be relieved from its operations during the war.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator ought to have brought that to our attention when the bill was under consideration. I agree with him fully that it ought to be done.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It ought to be done, and I shall avail myself of another opportunity to meet this situation.

Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina if he thinks there is discretionary power enough in the Treasury Department to waive a return under the income-tax law as to soldiers who are now in the Army?

Mr. OVERMAN. I think, Mr. President, that if the department could extend the time 30 days in favor of civilians they could certainly extend it 60 days, or even 90 days, for the soldiers, and that they would do so.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Of course, I would not care to delay the adoption of the report, but I am sorry that the subject was not thought of before. I do want to impress upon my colleagues that it is really an important matter and one which should have attention.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief examination of this report. I do not like to delay the Senate, but I should like to be allowed about five minutes in which to examine the report.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to speak briefly upon this report while the Senator from Missouri is examining it.

Mr. President, I called attention a few days ago to the situation in the country with reference to farm labor, and particularly as to the effect which the next draft would have upon the farm-labor conditions. After those remarks were made in the Senate I received a letter from Gen. Crowder discussing the matter, and I feel disposed to say another word this morning in regard to it. I think it is not perhaps receiving sufficient attention by reason of the absence of knowledge of the facts as they actually exist.

When I formerly discussed this subject, I stated that if the next draft had the same effect upon the depletion of farm labor as the last draft had had it would leave the farm situation in a very serious condition. The statement which Gen. Crowder made was that there had been a comparatively small per cent of farm labor taken in the draft as compared with other industries, and so forth. So far as the per cent is concerned, that may be true; but we must bear in mind, Mr. President, that other industries have been drawing from the farms for the past 10 years, and particularly for the last 3 or 4 years, until the supply of farm labor has been reduced to a minimum, and the taking of any portion of that, unless there was some other means to supply the places of those taken, works a great detriment. Farm labor being reduced to a minimum it is perilous to draw from it if we are to keep up in any degree our production. To my mind the man who produces food is on a par in winning the war with those who serve their country in any other way. Measured in sacrifice it is not so great a service, but measured in importance it ranks with any other service.

Mr. President, I read from an editorial in the New York Times, based upon a report of the New York Board of Trade and Transportation. This report of the New York Board of Trade and Transportation has been epitomized, and, as abbreviated, states:

> Maine: Great shortage of farm labor; acreage probably will be reduced by one-fourth or one-third. Texas: More labor needed than ever before, but supply is much below normal. North Dakota: Alarming shortage; farmers discouraged and can not plant for normal crop. Vermont: Shortage means a cut in production. Massachusetts: Serious situation; farmers can not go ahead with only the help of boys and untrained workmen. Connecticut: Depressing conditions; farmers may try to raise only enough for their families. Rhode Island: Many will not plant as much as last year. New Jersey: Farmers think that planting of even the usual acreage will be very hazardous. Pennsylvania: Very great shortage of skilled farm labor; the exodus from farms has been continuous. Delaware: Unless relief comes, the usual acreage can not be prepared. Maryland: Labor situation is acute. Virginia: Lack of labor, and acreage reduced accordingly. Georgia: Impossible to cultivate as much land as last year's area. Florida: Affected by loss of negro workmen drawn to the North; hope the Government will bring Porto Ricans. Ohio: Farmers discouraged and at their wits' ends. Indiana: Probably a reduction of acreage. Illinois: The number of idle acres will be increased.
> Commenting upon this, the board says the present prospect is "that acreage this year must be greatly reduced, with consequent short crops, meaning still higher food prices." A farm census taken by the New York Food Commission shows for the year a loss of 35,000 full-time workers, 15,000 of whom have gone into military service. But the addition of women and boys, with the return of about 14,000 men, makes the net reduction 8,000. It is encouraging to be told that in New York there will be no loss of cereal acreage, but an addition of 110,000 acres for corn.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Idaho there?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. I have had letters from every section of the State of Kansas, in which the writers advise me that there is a shortage of farm hands in their locality; and in one county alone—a small county—in the western part of the State 5,000 acres of wheat land were abandoned because the farmers could not get the labor to enable them to attend the land.

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. OWEN and Mr. SMITH of Michigan addressed the Chair.

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. I desire to confirm the report in regard to farm labor which comes from Oklahoma. The farmers are finding a very serious shortage of farm labor there.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if the Senator from Idaho will permit me, I desire to make the same observation regarding farm-labor conditions in Michigan. I do this because it does not seem to have been stated in the report which has been read, and I do not want the impression to prevail that we have a surplus of agricultural labor in Michigan. That is very far from the fact.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have a letter here from Kansas which is written by the editor of what is called the Horse and Farm Review, in which he states:

> Allow me to say that if the next draft operates as did the first one, in this section of Kansas the farmers will be unable to operate their farms to anywhere near full capacity. In short, the present prospective wheat crop, if it matures as expected from present conditions, will find the supply of farm help so scarce that I hardly know how it will be harvested or thrashed and taken to market. What I write concerning this small town and its immediate vicinity is true through all those portions of Kansas and Nebraska that I have visited in a business way since last fall, when the first draft took away so many boys and men from the farms. We have a town here of 870 people. Our country population is not as heavy as 10 to 20 years ago, as so many men have added to their holdings of land. Formerly a family resided on practically every quarter section; now the farms are hardly ever smaller than 320 acres, and from that up to 1,000 acres.

Mr. President, I am perfectly aware that it is a very difficult matter for the executive departments to deal with, yet it was supposed to be one of the virtues of the selective draft to enable the Government to protect those industries which were really as essential to the prosecution of the war as the putting of men in uniform. The farm boy and the laborer on the farm, of course, are under the same obligation to serve their Government, and undoubtedly are just as willing to serve their Government, as men in any other walk of life; but the thought which I desire to impress upon those who may be interested in the matter is that if these boys must be taken from the farm there ought to be a labor program devised to provide some method or means by which to supply their places when they are so taken.

One particular point which is impressed upon my mind by reason of correspondence received this morning is the uncertainty as to what the next draft law will do and as to when it will be put into execution. That is deterring men from planting their acreage now. This letter says:

> We have about 400 boys in this county who are in class 1 of the next draft. Most of these boys are farmers, as you know this is a farming community.
> I am the food and fuel administrator of the county, and a number of these men have asked me to try to find out, if I could, when the next draft would be drawn. These boys are on the anxious seat, in suspense, not knowing what to do about making arrangements for putting out a crop. If they knew they would have time to put the crop in, they would be glad to do it, and if they knew they would not have the time they would make other arrangements.

It is the uncertainty which is producing the disturbance in this instance.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the learned Senator will permit me just at this point, I desire to say that I have received from my constituents in Mississippi not less than 25 letters on the subject referred to in the letter which the Senator has just read. These men are pleading with me to ascertain, if I can, whether or not it will be possible to obtain for them a furlough that they may return home to plant and cultivate their crops. I have heard from others who have been drafted and they have universally said to me that on account of the scarcity of labor they are unable to employ men to work their farms and the consequence would be that their farms would lie fallow during the present year. This presents a problem that the wise and prudent statesmen can not overlook at this time. Ample food for Americans and our allies is an indispensable prerequisite to the successful prosecution of this war.

I am glad that the able Senator from Idaho is calling attention to what seems to me a fatal oversight. The well-trained, industrious farmer will produce on the farm more than a half a dozen untrained men from other vocations of life. The man from the cities and towns can take the place of the farmer in the ranks of the Army, but he can not perform the duties or take the place of the farmer on the farm. The town man can keep time in the drill, but he can not keep step with the mule in the furrow. And I submit that it will be a wise economy—an act of great generalship—to permit the men accustomed to agricultural pursuits to remain on the farm, or go back to the farm, and produce the things necessary to feed and clothe the women and children at home and maintain our soldiers and our allies in foreign lands.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We brought this subject to the attention of the office of the Provost Marshal General, and were advised that no definite order had been issued; that we would be safe in answering correspondents and saying that the War Department had under consideration a plan to care for the difficulty presented, and that farmers needed to plant the spring crops and care for them until harvest need have no great apprehension in this regard.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am glad to have that information, and particularly glad to have it stated publicly, so that we may all avail ourselves of it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wired that to Georgia two or three days ago, and stated that the Provost Marshal General's office felt that the farmers need not hesitate to plant their crops and hoped they would do so.

Mr. BORAH. I assume that when the order is issued it will be a general order applying to the entire country.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have no doubt a general order will be issued when the subject is finally determined. I think it has been delayed on account of some legislation that is pending—just what I do not know—but I may be wrong about that. I feel confident, however, that it is the desire of the Provost Marshal General's office that the men, even in class 1, who have farm work to do should go ahead planting their crops, and it seems probable that such men will be allowed to continue planting.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I wish to express my approval of what the Senator has suggested, and to emphasize the importance of a liberal policy of exemption with respect to farm labor. I do not know whether the Senator from Idaho has made the statement or not, but I would like to have it go into the RECORD at this place that last year England exempted, or released from Army service, 25,000 skilled farm laborers and 25,000 unskilled farm laborers; that, in addition to that, she released 20,000 laborers during the harvest season, and, in addition even to that, has organized what is called a "woman's land army," consisting of 250,000 women to render service upon the farms. The figures sound small to an American, but in comparison with English farming they form a considerable ratio to the requirements of farm labor.

If the Senator will permit me further, I will say that, in proportion to the registration, a larger percentage of farm hands and farmers have been accepted than from any other class in the United States. I intended to bring the statistics here, but 8.47 per cent of all who registered assigned their business as farming, forestry, and live-stock raising. They stand at the head of the list in percentage, while I believe that certain professional classes only sent some six and a fraction per cent. I will furnish the exact figures before the RECORD goes to press.

The last letter I dictated, only a few moments ago, was in reply to a farmer stating that he had been placed in class 1 and that he would have to shut down his farm and sell his stock if he should be called. I have many letters of similar import.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I read in the news reports a few days ago that the Labor Department was of the opinion that there was really no shortage of labor, but that the difficulty arose out of the inability to fairly distribute the labor in the different parts of the country according to the needs or demands of particular sections. I trust that that is true, Mr. President; and one of the reasons for calling attention to this situation is that those who have in charge the question of mobilizing the labor of the country and distributing it according to the demand may understand that, whatever the reports to the contrary may be, there is an actual shortage of labor upon the farms throughout the entire Middle West and far West, and that there ought to be an assurance to those communities that labor will be forthcoming to take the place of any man who may be taken from the farm hereafter to serve in the Army. The farmer needs labor and he needs to know definitely that he is going to have it.

Those of us who represent farming communities—agricultural communities, particularly—make no plea in this Chamber or elsewhere for exemption of our men from the service which they may be called upon to render along with their fellow countrymen, wherever it may take them; but we realize, as everyone realizes, that the food supply can not with safety to the cause be diminished, and if they are called upon to serve their country in the capacity of soldiers, there must necessarily be some program which will supply their places upon the farm; otherwise the productive capacity of the country will be diminished to such an extent as to be destructive.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. What the Senator says, of course, is important and it is accurate in the effect stated upon the food supply of the country and of the world. As I understood the Senator, he said, in substance, that a farmer ought not to be drafted and taken away for the military service unless some program could be devised to have him replaced by some other workman. That is very interesting if it can be done; but has the Senator in mind or has he worked it out sufficiently to make a suggestion as to how that could be done? I confess it is confusing to me. I approve the thing if it is possible or practicable, but I do not see how it is.

Mr BORAH. I base my belief upon the proposition that it may be done upon facts and figures which have been presented through the press from the Labor Department, that there is not a shortage of labor in the country as a whole; that if it is known where the labor is short and where there is a demand for it, it may be had.

The draft law only covers men of a certain age, and there are plenty of men beyond that age in the country who are not earning a dollar or doing anything. These are times, Mr. President, when a man ought not to be permitted to eat unless he performs whatever service he can perform to the community. Last fall on my way East, after being in the West, I stopped over in one of the great cities of the country, and, having been informed to some extent as to the scarcity of labor in that part of the country, I made it my business to inform myself as to the possibility of securing labor from that particular city, men who are practically doing nothing; and there are hundreds, and I think hundreds of thousands, of men beyond the draft age who ought to be at work.

Mr. STONE. It has been proposed, as the Senator knows and as all of us know, and widely discussed, that some program or policy should be entered upon to draft workmen, laborers, as well as soldiers. That is, compulsory labor, of course, on the farms or in the shops or shipbuilding establishments, or whatever the place may be. Now, if we are prepared to enter upon that program and can constitutionally maintain it, it may be the solution. What does the Senator think of that?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not think the time has arrived when the conscription of labor is necessary. However, so far as I am concerned, I have no hesitancy in saying that the time may come when the idler in this war will have to heed his country's commands and help to feed the soldier who has offered his life for his country. If the situation ever comes when that is necessary, I think we will be able to enforce it in this country, but I do not think it is necessary yet to do that. As I said a moment ago, the Labor Department has stated that it has the data, the information, and the means by which to supply this labor if it can be known where it is needed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator will recognize that there are two practical questions involved in his theory of securing labor for the farm. The first and the most important one is the question of wages. How are you going to take laborers from the city, where they can get four and five dollars a day for working seven or eight hours a day, and get them onto a farm, where the labor certainly would be more than eight hours a day, and where farm prices will not justify the payment of those prices to labor?

No farmer in my State, for instance, can raise wheat at $2 or $2.50 a bushel and pay his labor $90 to $100 a month and board. That is what labor is demanding in our State to-day—$90 a month and board, which would be equivalent to about $130 a month. That seems to me the real trouble; and the only way that I see to get out of it now is for us to apply our draft so that we will not take so many of our soldiers from the farm lands during the year 1918, at least not until after the crop is harvested.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think the suggestion of the Senator may be the practical solution of the matter. It is up to those who have to deal with the situation to determine whether or not labor can be supplied to take the place of those who are drafted. If it is not possible to do so, it is as clear as can be that they ought not to be drafted, because the food supply is just as essential to the situation as the man power upon the western front; and, of course, if its place can not be supplied it ought not to be taken away from the farm.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I simply desired to ask permission to interrupt the Senator, because I was interested in the remark which the Senator from North Dakota made, that the way to get out of the difficulty was to do something by way of changing the draft. I was going to ask the Senator from North Dakota if he did not think a very much larger measure of relief would be afforded to the wheat growers of North Dakota if the law of supply and demand were permitted to operate with respect to wheat?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I admit that we would be in very much better condition, because under the present situation we allow the law of supply and demand to operate in the labor field, and allow the labor to secure whatever the demand may be, while in the production of wheat we say that the farmer shall not receive more than a certain amount per bushel, $2.20 a bushel being the price fixed for the 1918 crop.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. Prsident——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. RANSDELL. I should like to ask the Senator if, in his judgment, we might not relieve the situation somewhat by applying to the unskilled labor on the farms the rule which I understand, in the practical application of the draft law, is applied to the skilled labor? I understood that the skilled labor would not be required to be taken under questionnaire 1; that the necessary managers of farms and the skilled, expert labor on farms would be exempt, or at least they would not come under questionnaire 1, but that the unskilled labor would. Now, why could we not put all farm labor in the same class and not call them in the first draft? Would it not be wise to do that at the present time, when such tremendous demands are being made on us to produce food?

Mr. BORAH. I am willing to leave that part of it to the executive department, Gen. Crowder, and those who have to deal with it, if they know the actual facts. The general seemed to be under the impression that there was not the shortage upon the farm that some of us thought existed. I am quite sure that he understands as readily as any of us the necessity of keeping up the supply upon the farm; and if he ascertains that fact, certainly some method will be arranged by which either to leave the man on the farm or to furnish some one to take his place. I think, so far as the practical results are concerned, that you had better leave him there, because he knows more about the business than anybody that you are likely to send there.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HOLLIS. I wanted to ask the Senator from Idaho, who is a man of liberal views, a deep student, and philosophical in his handling of these matters, if he does not see a very great difference between drafting a man to fight for his country, where he is given his living by his country, is paid by his country, is under the command of trained officers who are responsible to higher officers for the treatment of the men, and drafting a man and setting him to work on a farm or in a shop under a private man, for the benefit of that man, to earn profits for that man, to be paid as the man chooses, and to be paid or not according as the man is responsible? I think the Senator will see a very great difference.

Mr. BORAH. Undoubtedly there is a difference, Mr. President; and yet, at the same time, if the time ever comes in this country when we can not have a sufficient food supply without putting men to work who now refuse to work, men who are living off the community and in no wise aiding the community, so far as I am concerned I am willing to try out the experiment. I have said, however, that I do not think the time has arrived. It is about the most serious step that we could take in this situation, and it ought not to be taken until all other means have been exhausted. I doubt if the time ever comes when it will be necessary to do so; but the preservation of the country is infinitely more important to me than the right of a man to live in a community to which he is in no sense contributing to the general welfare. Soldiers will not be permitted to go hungry while idlers loaf at home. It is not laborers who I complain of, but idlers, pure and simple.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does not the Senator think that we ought to get our draft in such shape as to be able to operate it in such a way as to take into the Army the men whom the Senator has just described as idlers and doing nothing, and leave the men who are working until a last resort?

Mr. BORAH. That would be a very good solution. If they feel that they do not want to be drafted for labor, let them be drafted to fight. It is a time of common service. The common country calls for support and every man must do his duty. If there be those so blind to the great issues involved in this conflict, so heedless of the consequences of defeat, so unmindful of their country's need that they will not serve, then they must be directed by their country, by the Government, where to fall into line.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I was very greatly pleased with the statement made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] that he had had information from the Judge Advocate General's office with reference to labor being permitted to remain on the farm this spring; but I wanted to suggest that if additional legislation is needed, I hope the committee in charge of that subject will report the bill out as soon as possible.

Last fall the labor situation was so serious upon the farms in Kansas that a delegation was sent on here, headed by the former governor of our State, Mr. Stubbs. I arranged a meeting with the Secretary of War, and we called upon the Secretary, and presented very fully the question as to the situation in our State, and showed the shortage of labor on the various farms in every section of the State. The Secretary of War requested that committee to make a full and complete showing in writing, which I am informed was done; and when I called up the department a few days ago no final action had then been taken. I was not advised at that time that additional legislation was needed. If the Senator who has taken up this question with the Judge Advocate General will take it up again and find out what legislation is needed, I shall be very glad to have him do so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I think I understand the bill to which they referred, but I do not desire to mention it. I think it will be passed within a few days.

Mr. CURTIS. If the Senator knows what legislation is required, and what bill is referred to——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator repeated my statement a little more strongly than I made it myself.

Mr. CURTIS. I did not intend to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am sure of that; but I do not wish to place the Provost Marshal General's office in any false position.

Mr. CURTIS. Neither do I.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am sure of that; and if the Senator was doing that, it was due to my misleading him. The information we got, and the statement I have made in consequence of it, was that I could say to those in the first draft who had a crop ahead of them that the wise thing for them to do was to go ahead and plant the crop; that it was not believed that they would be called to camp in a way to prevent it; and it was hoped that provision could be made later, also, even to gather it.

Mr. OWEN and Mr. McCUMBER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To whom does the Senator from Kansas yield, if to anyone?

Mr. CURTIS I want to answer the Senator from Georgia first, and then I will yield the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was no complete committal; but I concluded that the probabilities were so great that I sent the information at once to my own State, with the advice to go ahead and plant their crops.

Mr. CURTIS. I want to assure the Senator that, so far as I am concerned—and I think I can speak for all the Senators from the farming States—if that bill is reported, we will assist in getting it through as soon as possible.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, what I wanted to ask the Senator from Kansas, or any other Senator who can answer the question, is concerning the next draft. Has there been any time fixed for making another draft upon those who are registered?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I have no personal information on that point, but I read in the newspapers, I think, yesterday or the day before, that the draft was likely to be put in force in June.

Mr. McCUMBER. In June?

Mr. BORAH. There was a statement published, seeming to be authoritative, that it would be put into execution in June.

Mr. McCUMBER. What are we to do with them after we have drafted them? We will put them in cantonments, of course; I appreciate that; but after they have been drilled, then what are we going to do with them?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know. I did not venture upon that uncertain sea. All I know is that if they are drafted and taken into the Army, we shall be badly injured. Whatever the War Department sees fit to do with them, whether it can utilize them or not, is a thing to which I have not given any consideration. I assume that they had reason for taking them or they would not take them, but the injury to which I was addressing myself would have been achieved.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand the Senator, but I can not for the life of me see any occasion for drafting any soldiers between now and next fall. Secretary Baker stated that he had an Army now of 1,500,000 ready to send to France. Secretary Baker also testified that he did not have the ships, and further, that he did not know where he was going to get the ships to transport them, and to support them.

Now, as a matter of fact, we know that with the most optimistic view that we can give of the shipping situation we can not put 500,000 soldiers over in France during 1918. That being true, inasmuch as we have already a million that we can not put over there with the present situation, then tell me the necessity of taking another three or four or five hundred thousand men from the farms in the United States during the summer of 1918. There is no occasion for it. We can not use them. We can not send them over there. The whole crux of the matter is the question of shipping, and that is the matter to which we ought to give our attention now. Let us get the ships to take over the men that we have here before we think of drafting another army of 1,500,000.

Mr. OWEN and Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota addressed the Chair.

Mr. CURTIS. So far as I am concerned, I yield the floor, unless the Senator desires to ask a question. I have made the statement I desired to make.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I merely wanted to call attention to an instance which seemed to negative the idea that the farmers would not be called in the first class. I was appealed to a few days ago by a constituent who was farming 400 acres, and had 160 acres of wheat, who was summoned to go into camp, and he was not subject to be relieved because of having this crop on his hands. He has 400 acres of ground, but still he was called away from the administration of that farm. He was in the first selective draft.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Oklahoma, right at this juncture, to the fact that there are two things operating right now to cause this uncertainty as to the crops. One is the question raised about when you are going to have your next draft. I know farmers down in my State who are afraid to contract with certain labor for fear that about the time their crops are planted, and the working season comes on, their labor will be drafted. Therefore they are hesitating about employing this labor for fear that they will have a crop left on their hands that they will be unable to work after they have gone to the expense of preparing the ground and buying fertilizer and stock to work it. In addition to the uncertainty as to when the draft is going to be made, there is also the uncertainty as to who is going to be drafted. It seems to me the two things to be settled are, if we are going to have another draft, when it is to be, and what is to be the character of those who are going to be drafted? I think it is very clear that we ought now to determine when the draft is going to be, if possible, or ascertain when it is going to be, and whether or not farm labor is going to be exempted, and then provide that the quota shall be drafted out of those who are not needed on the farms.

In my State, which is almost purely an agricultural State, practically the entire draft will come from the farm laborers, or at least a large percentage of it; so that we are affected now. Men are hesitating right now about planting a crop, and this is planting time with us. We begin to plant corn in March, and the other crops will come on up to about the 1st of May or perhaps the middle of May. Now, as a farmer, I do not know myself whether to employ labor of a certain age, for fear that labor will be interfered with by the draft. It seems to me that if we are going to make a supply of food it is essential for us to go at this thing in a wise way, so that these uncertainties may be eliminated. It is not enough to say that we do not know whether or not the draft is going to be made at a certain time, because upon that depends the contract; and I was a little surprised——

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Does not the present law vest in the Chief Executive the discretion in the matter the Senator has just been discussing? Has not the Chief Executive under the law the power to exempt from the draft and permit to remain on the farm the man who owns or works the farm? I thought the President's power was plenary—well-nigh unlimited—in such matters.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That was my impression; but that does not seem to be quite the impression that exists here, and I think at this juncture it ought to be forcibly brought to the attention of those who have this matter in charge that the support of the Army itself is largely dependent upon the discretion they use in this matter.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That can be done, in my judgment, without additional legislation, if I understand correctly the law. The power is already vested in the Executive in conscripting the Army—perhaps it might be more euphonious to say selecting the Army—and to exempt from military service the man on the farm who is so much needed to produce the things necessary to feed and clothe the Army, the men, women, and children of America, and our allies across the waters. I have always understood that the selective feature was the crowning virtue—the excuse, in fact—for giving conscription preference over the old American system of volunteering.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I merely wish to state to the Senator that I was a little surprised to hear the Senator from Georgia speak so optimistically as to what they propose to do here. The expectation is exactly to the contrary. I went to one of the chief heads and had some discussion with him and called his attention to the fact I am now drawing the attention of the Senate to, and his reply was that we would have to go to work and have these men drafted and train them, because we do not know at what time we may need additional trained men, and they are within the draft age. I came away with the impression that they were going to take the pro rata of all, regardless of their occupation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Idaho has started, I think, a very useful discussion this morning, and the Senate will probably take time on the subject. My files are filled to bursting with correspondence on this subject from the western country, from my State and adjoining States.

I have among my constituents, Mr. President, in what is known as the loop district in Chicago, a number of ultimate consumers who are living in a state of chronic unproductive idleness. I should like to join with the Senator in devising some remedy—they are within the draft age—and make them bear some useful part in this crisis. I do not know how we will do it. We are losing what mechanics would call a lost motion in very large quantities. We are taking men off the farms, and we are beginning to bring men from the city on the farms in some cases, through labor agencies, Federal and State; and after they are there they meet the difficulty the Senator speaks of, and we are losing one season of profitable work if we undertake to make out of the city man a farm hand. No novice can do that work. It requires artistic ability to do the work. A city man can not develop that in one summer.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think the whole matter could be summed up in getting before these officers the necessity of drafting just the kind of men the Senator from Illinois refers to until we fill the next draft quota, and allow those who are actually engaged in farming, because it takes some skill, to raise wheat and cotton and corn. A novice can not do it. It takes some skill to use a hoe properly. A novice can not do it. Therefore, in order to get to a maximum crop you must leave your farmer who understands farming on the farm and take those who are nonproductive to fill out the quota.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I am somewhat interested in this phase of the discussion. It seems to me that Congress might very well provide for a new draft for soldiers and extend the age to 35 or 40 and require men over the age of 31, all unmarried men and all childless married men and all other men in cities whose occupation is not absolutely necessary to the successful prosecution of the war, to go to the firing line, bring them into camp, and make soldiers of them, and to say that a man who is on the farm and stays on the farm and produces stuff shall remain there. Congress might very well do that, and I think it would relieve the conditions, if they are as bad as reported.

There is another thing, Mr. President, that I do not like to hear discussed in the way we hear it discussed. There is a suggestion from the Senator on the other side in the question, "What will we do with these men if we draft them?" There is a like suggestion from a Senator on this side in saying, "If we have another draft." The time has come when we must quit talking about if we have another draft or what we are going to do with these men when drafted. My impression is that you will have 10,000,000 men in camps in this country before the war is successfully finished and over 3,000,000 of them across the sea.

It is time that we realized the condition as it is, time that we got down to business and began to perform something toward its accomplishment. These men must be put in the cantonments; they must be trained; and they can and will be sent to France inside of a year, more than 1,000,000 of them; and there will be another draft and yet another draft, and in my opinion we will draft enough to make 10,000,000 men in camp before we finish the war successfully.

It is time to quit talking about if we are going to do this and if we are going to do that. We are going to do it. We have embarked on the enterprise, and it is necessary that these things must come to pass. Then, let us meet it as the situation demands and quit talking about if we will and if we can.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I think the difficulty in the administration of this draft act is that it is at last in the hands of local committees that are scattered all over the United States and the heads of the deparment were authorized to pass finally upon appeal cases. It does not, as a matter of fact, control the selection of these men. They are selected by the local committees, and their appeals to the local committees are not heard. The local committees are, as a rule, men living in the towns, and they would prefer to distribute the drafted men in the towns and in the country, just as it may happen. They do not want to send all the men from the towns and leave all the men in the country; they want to distribute them. But it is obviously necessary that we provide the allies with foodstuffs and with raw material, and therefore men on the farm are just as necessary as men in the trenches.

That being true, I think Congress ought to adopt a concrete scheme and not merely talk about the matter. I think the men on the farm who understand farming and have been trained as farmers ought to be left where they are, at least for this crop season.

Mr. VARDAMAN. There is a scarcity of workmen on the farm now, the deficiency exists now, and it can only be supplied by returning to the farms men who have been conscripted up to date and taken away from the farm. The deficiency will not be supplied by mere failure to take away more men. The deficiency may be increased, the scarcity enlarged, by future drafts. But the needs existing now can only be supplied by returning the men, whose taking away caused the deficiency, back to their accustomed vocation. You will not improve the situation materially by prohibiting further conscription of the farmers.

Now, Mr. President, I would not in any way weaken our Army by taking the farmer from the ranks if it were necessary and really strengthened our lines to keep him there. But I realize, and every other Senator realizes, that his place in the Army can be supplied by men taken from other walks of life and thereby permit him to go back and work his farm and produce the needed crops. We will have more men left after the agricultural element shall have been taken from the Army and sent back to their homes than we will have ships to carry them to Europe in the next 12 months or 18 months. There is no wisdom or economy in organizing a great Army to be sent to Europe when there is no means of transportation to get it there, and I submit it will not give strength to the Army or efficiency to our forces to train them in the art of warfare when there is nothing with which to feed and clothe them. The strength of an army consists not only in the accuracy of marksmanship and the use of the great cannons, but the first and most important element is something to eat and clothes to cover their nakedness.

Mr. OWEN. I think it would suffice if we did not take any more men from the farms, at least, but we are going on taking them from the farms. The farms have already been much depleted. I was talking to the head of the Farmers' Union only to-day, and he was telling me of a meeting of twelve or thirteen hundred men, and at that meeting of farmers the question was put to them, "How many of you have the same amount of labor that you had a year ago?" Only two or three arose. "How many of you can get along for the year with the labor that you have?" Several hundred arose. "How many can not get along with the labor that you have?" and all the remainder of them stood up, showing that there were at that particular meeting four-fifths or more of the farmers unsupplied with proper labor.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the able Senator from Oklahoma will permit an interruption, I would like to suggest that a great many of the men now in the Army have been taken from the industrial life of the country, many of them compelled to abandon their farms and take up arms in defense of the Nation's flag. It is well known that their places on the farm can not be taken or supplied by men from the cities. As I have heretofore stated, the man accustomed to city life is wholly untrained and inexperienced in the matter of performing the duties of the farmer. As little as we think about it, there are no more skilled, artistic, and, in many instances, scientific laborers in the land than the successful tiller of the soil. The successful farmer must not only understand handling agricultural implements but he must know something of the nature and growth of plants, the effect of the change of the season; he must know something about the character of his soil, its deficiencies, and the sort of fertilizer needed to produce an abundant yield. The manner of cultivating the plants, the time to plow, and how to plow are scientific problems which the seasoned farm laborer alone understands. He must also be familiar with the habits, the nature, and general disposition of the live stock upon the farm. To be a successful farmer—and when I use the word "farmer" I mean the laborers upon the farm as well as the director of the farm labor—it requires a lifetime study of experimentation and intelligent observation.

So, Mr. President, in consideration of all of these things, I think if this matter were called seriously to the attention of the Executive and those administrative officers around him charged with the serious duty of conducting this war there is no doubt but that the President, having the power now, to order these bona fide farmers back to the farm and supply their places in the ranks of the Army with other men from the cities or elsewhere, I repeat there is no doubt about such an order issuing forthwith. The necessity for it is manifest. You can supply the place in the ranks of the Army now filled by the farmer boy with town men or professional men, but I insist that you can not supply the place of the trained farmer on the farm with the city-bred, inexperienced man. As I have heretofore stated, I think nothing will contribute more to the cause we are all so deeply interested in now as sending these men back to the farm and permitting them to remain there until they shall make a crop—produce the stuff necessary to clothe and feed the Army, which we now have, and the army yet to be organized. This seems to be one of the most important questions that has engaged the attention of this body for some time. The Congress can not afford to make a mistake in a matter of such far-reaching and vital concern. If you want to strengthen the Army and support our allies, there must be food and clothing for all; and we can not have food and clothing for all unless the man power is supplied to produce it. Talk is cheap and verbal patriotism is all right unless it should mislead us into some serious error of omission. But if this war is to be won it is to be won by the combined use of bullets and bread, clothing and courage, prudent action and heroic determination.

Mr. OWEN. I think the power does exist in the hands of the Executive, but that does not relieve the legislative branch of responsibility.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report on the so-called soldiers and sailors' civil-rights bill. Is there objection to the report?

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I have been told by somebody connected with the Government that it is expected to work out relief for the farmers through furloughs, but that additional legislation is needed before the proper authority is granted. The distinguished general in charge of the draft has done a most admirable piece of work. His chief object was to get an Army and he has gone out and gotten it. The rules that we laid down for his guidance were interpreted by him rather strictly, so that he did not encourage exemptions. For instance, among railroad employees the rule laid down was that a man must show that he was personally indispensable for conducting the operations of the railroad. The result was that no man could show that he was indispensable, as for running the Boston & Maine Railroad in my part of the country. But 1,800 of them have been drafted and the 1,800 were indispensable for the proper operation of the railroad, and it is largely because of the lack of young and active men of draft age who know the business thoroughly that the railroads have fallen into their present state of inefficiency. It is very largely due to that fact.

Among the farmers I am having complaints, as other Senators are, constantly of men who are indispensable for running a particular farm, but the members of the exemption board live in the villages and towns, as the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] says, and the State board is not composed usually of farmers. The result is that there have been very few exemptions of farmers.

Now, if the farmer knows enough he may appeal to the State board and he may appeal to the President, but the President of the United States should not be charged with deciding on cases of exemption for farmers. That duty should be submitted by Congress to some one who can investigate a case and exempt a man when the facts justify it. But a better way is this, and it will solve largely the labor difficulties that have been suggested here. Draft men, and draft them liberally. Then, if a man is willing to go to work on a farm for some one else give him a furlough. If he is not willing to work there, take him back and let him drill.

Answering the Senator from North Dakota, these men must be taken and trained first. There will be another draft, I assume, if they have not enough men under training now to satisfy the requirements, but if after the men are trained or during training there is a necessity for farm labor, the right should be given somewhere in the department to investigate a particular case and say this man or this company or this group of men shall be granted a furlough during the planting season or the haying season or the crop season. We in that way would give relief, and it is up to the Military Affairs Committee to give us legislation in that particular.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator would give them furloughs?

Mr. HOLLIS. I would give them furloughs, and then they would be subject to call.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to reply most briefly to the very earnest statement made by the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] that we should cease talking about what are we going to do with these men, and so forth, and that we are going to put 3,000,000 men over in France and to have an Army of 10,000,000 men. Mr. President, in my State among the Indians we call that "much big talk." But that big talk is not going to win the war. We have got to have some character of arrangement whereby we can concurrently with the raising of our army also secure ships to take care of that army. That we have not done so far. In 1917 we promised our allies that we would furnish them 6,000,000 gross tonnage of shipping. We did not give them 2,000,000 gross new tonnage afloat in 1917. We promised that we would get nine or ten million tons in 1918. The present outlook is not for half of that.

Now, we want our army. I wish we could put 5,000,000 men over in France, and I would love to support a provision of that character, but I know that we can not put them there until we get our shipping; and all our energy and all our talk should be given first to securing a sufficient number of ships to take care of the million men whom we have now in our cantonments before we attempt to raise another army, with a certain knowledge staring us in the face that it would be two years before it would be possible for us to secure the amount of shipping to take care of the million we already have. That is all I am in hope of securing; and we are not going to put 3,000,000 men over there before that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the observation of my friend the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] about "giving men furloughs while they go home and harvest a crop" or run home and load the trucks or relieve a railroad congestion, or something of that sort, reminds me of the old story they used to tell of Gov. Joe Brown, of Georgia, during War between the States. It was said that he wrote a letter to Jeff Davis and said, "My dear Mr. President, why do you keep the farmer boys away from home in camps all the time? Why do you not let them stay at home and make a crop until you are about to fight a battle, and then tell the boys to come, and they will all go there and fight it? I know the Georgia boys will." Mr. President, we can not carry on war in that sort of a way.

Now, what is this situation? Whom have we drafted? Have we drafted all the men in the United States? By no means. We have drafted the men between 21 and 31 or the men who have arrived at 21 and arrived at 31. Do you mean to tell me that if all the men between 21 and 31 were to die to-morrow America could not raise food enough for itself and food enough to export? That it would be a great inconvenience, there is no doubt. That it would be a hardship, there is no doubt. That it would be a serious hardship, there is no doubt. But if they all died, so far as the farms of this country are concerned, there would be plenty of men left to work them under 21 and over 31 to make foodstuffs enough to feed the American people.

Now, Mr. President, I am getting a little tired of this "patrioteering" business. I love patriotism, but I have been reading the last two numbers of the Saturday Evening Post and a couple of poems on patrioteering that I found there, and if any Senator has not read them he ought to read them. Men go out and exploit themselves about "meatless Tuesdays" and "wheatless Thursdays," and they seem to think they are doing something very patriotic. The whole Confederacy lived without wheat at all for I do not know how long—about three years, at least, in the coast and southwest departments and the southern department; they had none. I as a boy in the Confederacy did not see anything made out of wheat from the early part of 1862 until the surrender, except now and then we would plant a little patch of wheat and grind it on a corn mill and sift it as best we could in the kitchen for the purpose of making Christmas and birthday cakes.

Then we were confronted with the fact that we did not have any sugar for the cakes, and we had to make them with molasses for "sweetening."

What is the use of talking about the "hardships" of the American people? They have not suffered any hardships. You have not put your front toe into the anteroom of the temple of Mars. You have thus far done nothing except to complain, and to complain again, and to repeat complaints about the efforts of those who are as patriotic as you or I in attempting under official oath and high responsibility to do what they can to win the war. Read those two poems on patrioteering. They are worth reading. I wish I had them here; if I had them, I would read them with proper emphasis right now.

Every man between 21 and 31 years of age who is a common farm laborer, or who is merely a farmer, can, if absolutely necessary, be spared; but is it absolutely necessary? It ought not to be even under these circumstances; unless you find that a man presents an exceptional case. I know an instance of a boy who is running a motor tractor, for example, and cultivating 150 acres of land in corn and peas and oats and soy beans, and with them feeding hogs and cattle. If he lived farther north he would be cultivating it in wheat. He ought not to go out to bear a musket if he claims exemption. This particular boy did not claim it, but he ought not to have been sent, because he could have done infinitely more good with that motor plow than he could do with a musket, even if he killed a German every time he went into the trenches, which is, upon the average, once in four days.

Another class of men ought to be exempt—even of those who are between 21 and 31 years of age—and they are the skilled mechanics, carpenters, and miners of the country. Luckily most of the miners are aliens. One of my boys in command of a battalion had in his command 90 men, I think it was, though may be it was 60, who could not speak English. They were Hungarians, Poles, Bohemians, Italians, Slovaks, and Slavonians and Slovenes. One of the first things the boy had to do was to try to teach his soldiers English with what little help he could get. Added to the duty of trying to teach his officers French, he was pretty full of work besides his ordinary drill work.

Every one of those men came from the mining district of Pennsylvania, and they ought to have been left there. But that is an exceptional case. Those mines present an exceptional case, because coal is at the basis of it all, whether in peace or war. If you can not run the transportation and the factories, you can not clothe and ammunition and gun the men. Therefore, there ought to be a special rule for miners and for skilled mechanics for steel and wooden ships.

One more word, Mr. President. It requires just two things to win a war; there is nothing else under God's sun which can do it. Presidential proclamations can not do it; congressional resolutions can not do it; public patriotic addresses can not do it. It takes men and guns and food and transportation; men and guns and food constituting one side of the proposition and transportation constituting the other.

When I say food I mean for the soldiers and sailors. The men and women at home will find food enough to live on for the next three years even under hysterically anticipated conditions. Men over 31 and under 21 will make it and women can help. So when you want to win a war the thing you have got to do is to get hold of the men first and train them, and do it as rapidly as you can; transport them to the scene of actual operations as rapidly as you can; train them for special work adapted to the locale as rapidly as you can; put them under fire as rapidly as you can; follow them with food and accompany them with the guns and the ammunition, unless you can buy guns and ammunition cheaper and in greater quantities in the locale than you can at home. If you can, then, you will save transportation by buying them there.

I am sometimes afflicted with the utmost pessimism when I hear men talking about the lack of certain supplies to accompany soldiers to France to fight, when I hear men complaining that this or that or the other regiment did not have a hot "food-warming" stove, when I hear men complaining that overcoats were lacking, when, even if a sufficient number had been furnished in the first place, boys, with their carelessness, would have lost or misplaced or sold or pawned a great many of them and more would have had to come from the Quartermaster Department; when I hear men complaining that soldiers and sailors had no sleeping cars to ride on when they were being transported to the point of duty.

Why, do you know, Mr. President, a story was once told me, which I have every reason to believe to be true, that there was a company in the Confederate Army which at one time, in 1864, had but one skillet? The captain wanted it, and he found out that the first lieutenant had it, and he sent for it. The first lieutenant reported that he was sorry, but the sergeant had borrowed it, and they found that the sergeant was washing his feet in it. [Laughter.]

What do you know about war? What do you know about the sufferings of war? Are you going to sit down here dilettante fashion and talk all the time—talk about peace at one end of the avenue and talk about war at the other end of the avenue? What you want is men in France—men in France. What you want to put them there is ships, and what you want to go along with them is something with which to shoot. All the balance of it is secondary. If you can not put up with the hardships that are mere incidents to the first three demands, then you are unworthy of your forefathers; you in the South are eminently unworthy of yours, because if there is anything in God's world that they understood it was hardship, suffering, endurance, fortitude, standing out to the bitter end so long as a man could stand

What is the use of all this patrioteering camouflage? Why, you have not even done what you ought to have done long ago. You ought to have called the boys of 19 and 20 into the service, not to go to France to fight, but for those 19 years of age to be trained two years until they are 21, so as to be ready for fighting, and for the men of 20 to be training for one year until they are ready to fight.

You have shown the most remarkable instance of American capacity to understand and to adapt itself to a situation that has ever been shown in the history of any country. What was it? When you turned these boys loose—most of them college boys—into the training camps, to make our officers out of them; and you have made thousands of the best subordinate commissioned officers that the world knows to-day, in three months' training. Often they had to take three more months, even better training, while they are training and teaching their men. You have done that. I say "you"; no, it is not you; oh, no. It was not you; it was not the legislating part of the United States, although you laid the foundations wisely; it was the boys; they have done it. They are ready to go; they are ready to put up with some hardships. They do not expect buckwheat cakes for breakfast. This reminds me of what I heard during that "Chickamauga War"—the War with Spain—when a good part of the Army never got any further than Chickamauga. There was a row raised down at Chickamauga because the troops did not have enough to eat; and old Maj. Pat Henry, of Mississippi, came to me and said, "My God, JOHN, I have examined into it, and do you know what they are complaining of, chiefly? They are complaining that they do not get pie over twice a week." He said, "JOHN, if we could have given the Confederate Army pie once a month, it would have had Washington captured in less than six months." [Laughter.]

People suffering on account of the war! Labor suffering! Labor never had as much money in the life of the world, here or anywhere else. Farmers suffering! They never made as much money out of their cattle and corn and oats and wheat and cotton and hogs since agriculture came into existence, here or anywhere else, as they are making now.

There are employees of the Government "suffering" and howling for an increase of pay, "all on account of the war." Howling for an increase while objecting to working eight hours a day—the dream of carpenters and operatives, while most Senators work not less than 12! Everybody is howling for increased pay, "all on account of the war." It is even whispered around the cloakrooms now and then that Senators and Representatives ought to have increased pay "on account of the war." It is said prices are charged you for a mutton chop this big [indicating] that would fit the market value of a lamb in a New York or Washington restaurant, and we are told it is "all on account of the war." We have got to have negro woman suffrage, "all on account of the war" [laughter]; we have to have nation-wide bone-dry prohibition, "all on account of the war." [Laughter.] Such another verbal display of patriotism and such another lack of any real hardship or suffering or sacrifice was never witnessed by any great people engaged in a great war as is witnessed right now in our own land.

Why, people flock into Washington every day to get office, and when they get here come to us and tell us, "My heavens, I can not rent anything nor buy anything; buy me something, rent me something"—"all on account of the war!"

Some of them say, "I have been in the habit of keeping an automobile, a Ford"—and, by the way, that is a luxury that I was never able to indulge in, not even a Ford—and I remember my admiration for those machines when one of them was made a present to the Senator from Michigan; but there are employees down here who keep Fords, and they absolutely tell us that if we do not raise their wages they "can not keep a Ford"—"all on account of the war!"

Where is the spirit of the men that lived and starved and froze with George Washington at Valley Forge? Has it disappeared? Where is the spirit of the men who ate rats and mice and mule meat at Vicksburg? Has it gone? Where is the spirit of the men who suffered at Petersburg, and even upon the day before the surrender won the last brilliant little skirmish of the war? Are their sons degenerate?

Oh, the hardships of the draft upon individuals and upon industry and upon life! Sometimes, Mr. President, when I think of the boys that have got to go "over there," some of them to be killed by poison gas, some of them to be the victims of trench diseases, some of them to be blown into eternity without time to say a paternoster, then think of us living here in luxury—because even the way I live is luxury for three-fourths of mankind, and the way that nine-tenths of you live is luxury compared even to the way I live—when I think of it all it sometimes seems to me that after a man reaches the age of 60—and I have reached that age and passed it—while the Philadelphia doctor is not right in saying that we ought to be chloroformed and "put off," it is a great pity that we can not be either put to something useful, somehow, or else quit pretending that we are doing anything sacrificial for our country.

I suppose most of you are like me. What have you done? I have given all the spare revenue I could get to the country; I have bought bonds; I have put in my little $1,000 for war savings stamps—all the Government will allow you to take of that kind of security. I am collecting from every source that I can in order to lend the money to the Government at 4 per cent, when I can get 6 per cent for it in Mississippi. I am not doing it, though, with any idea that I am making any sacrifice after I have done it all. What have I sacrificed? Just a few luxuries; that is all. Perhaps I will have to smoke cheaper cigars, and I will have to do without a few things that I would like to have—a new suit of clothes right now, for instance, when this one is dingy. What of it? If we lose the war we lose all; if we win, we win much that is better than clothes or cigars or money or bonds. But what of it? What have we done in comparison with the boys who are going "over there"? They have got to stand. What do they want? First, they want reenforcement just as rapidly as you can give it to them; next, they want ammunition and guns; and, third, they want food. "Third," I say, not "first." They will manage to get food some way for a while, if they have to live on the corn in the field. Stonewall Jackson's men made the great valley campaign upon corn gathered from the field. I do not say that is the best way, but I say the first thing is men, the next thing is munitions, and the third thing is food.

Do you imagine that there is no food in France and none in Switzerland or Spain or the Argentine or Cape Colony or India, and none in England? Do you imagine that ours is the only country in the world with any food? What is all this talk I hear of danger of Americans starving? Does anybody believe it? Suppose we have to take a beefsteak less now and then, or a mutton chop less here and there, or a cup of chocolate less in another place, or a little bit less of sugar, would we be any less healthy or strong or wise or good? I think there has been too much of that talk; that hysteria, in fact; and it has given too much comfort to the enemy. I picked up the other day what purported to be a translation of an editorial in a Berlin paper, and it went on to tell that the "entire transportation system of the United States had broken down," which was not true, but partially true; that the American Government was going to "ration its citizens" pretty soon or "else they would not have food enough"; which was not true in any sense of the word; and that the Americans were "dependent altogether upon the English and French for big guns and ammunition," which was not true at all, even ab initio. The only reason we ever bought any from them at all was because they begged us to do it, and because they could sell them to us cheaper than we could buy them, and save transportation; and yet that article, purporting to be a translation of an editorial in a Berlin newspaper, went on to prove its every assertion by quotations from debates in Congress and from American newspapers!

Then what came to all this investigation business? If you take a great, big glass and look at the sun it does not look like anything but a collection of specks, but it shines all the same, and it shines with a good heat in December and a lurid heat in August, and there are just as many specks on it in August as there are in December; but the main fact is that the sun is shining and that every genial spring that comes it recreates the earth, and that for every living human being it gives food and sustenance, and, through its evaporation of water to the clouds, it gives water to drink, and with these everything else.

I ask you what effect it has all had, except this: It has just simply discouraged, disheartened, frightfulized, cowed a few American mothers and sisters and wives by making them think that a sporadic and exceptional case here and there out of 750,000—so exceptional as to be absolutely remarkable—was the rule of the service, when you knew it was not, and I know it was not, and the men who exploited it on this floor knew that it was not, and all of them knew that the sun of patriotic efficiency was shining, and shining with American effulgence and American warmth and American life-giving properties.

What is the American life-giving property to the whole world? It is the spirit of a measured democracy, liberty conjoined with order; and what is threatening it in this world to-day? Prussianism on the one extreme and Russianism on the other—autocracy and bolsheviki; militarism and wild men who do not know what the history of the world has already proven, and are willing to try an experiment over for the forty-first time that has failed already 40 times. We must meet these two things or they will meet and murder our measured democracy. Either can do it unless we "play the man"—not later but to-day.

How have we been attempting to meet most of our difficulties? Why, in a perfectly impracticable way. We have been trying to fix prices. You can no more fix a price than you can moderate the warmth of the sun by a legislative decree. You do one of two things. You fix the price, yes, in a certain sense, because you may keep a fellow from selling higher by threatening him with jail; but if you fix the price too low, you decrease production; if you fix it too high, you breed speculation; and unless you are as wise as God Himself you can not fix it exactly right. There you are, all in a nutshell; just one of these two results—none other possible.

I voted for all of these things, or most of them, because I did not want anybody, even my worst enemy, to suspect that I was lagging anywhere along the line; but I did it when I knew it was not going to do any good—that part of it. I also knew that nothing but the experiment would satisfy and convince Congress and the people. Now, let supply meet demand; let the American people know what the demand is; let prices take care of themselves, and then production will take care of itself, and there will not be any trouble about enough coal nor food nor anything else, though there may be difficulty about prices, except with a few things that the Government itself controls, like postage stamps, and things of that sort.

Suppose we here and now center ourselves upon winning the war, and suppose we center ourselves upon the idea of putting men in France, putting men in France, putting men in France; letting the men carry ammunition, carry ammunition, carry ammunition. Danton said, "What is the first way to win the French Revolution? First, audacity. What is the next? Audacity. What is the third? Audacity—"encore l'audace." So it is with this thing. The way to win this war is men in France with guns, more men in France with more guns, more men in France with more guns, as well trained as you can get them; if you can not get them trained to suit a West Point graduate, then trained well enough to do their part, at any rate.

Mr. President, I started to say I had said enough. I believe I have said too much.

Mr. GORE obtained the floor.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, before the Senator goes on I hope he will let this report be adopted. He can proceed with his remarks then just the same.

Mr. GORE. I am not going to make any extended argument. I desire to put in the RECORD the figures to which I referred a while ago. I merely want to observe that I think there is no dearth of audacity in the country, certainly none in the Senate. I am as well convinced as anyone that you can neither win this war nor feed the Army by mere eloquent phrases. All that fine phrases and bad names can do to win the war has already been done. We must have recourse to other engines of war.

I adverted a few minutes ago to the fact that Great Britain, in the planting season last year, released 25,000 skilled farm hands and 25,000 unskilled hands, and that during the harvest season she released 20,000 more, in addition to an army of 250,000 women which she had organized for labor on the farms.

I have here the figures to which I adverted then, which I did not have at that time. The statement has been made that in this country only 1 per cent of the farming population has been drawn. Mr. President, that takes into account the entire farming population. I stated—and I have the figures here, the accuracy of which I do not doubt—that a larger percentage of farm registrants were drawn than from any other class of people in the United States. I say that because I do not think the farmers are whining, neither are their friends whining, and I do not think they are mistaken when they assert that bread is as important as bayonets to military success.

I might say, adverting to the last Senator's remarks—I do not know just how material it is—that my father was in the Confederate service for four years and was in prison for six months. He had three brothers in the Confederate Army. One of them is still at Fishing Creek. I think that the sons of Confederates and the sons of Union veterans and everybody else are willing to do their full duty, are willing to bear every necessary burden, are willing to make every necessary sacrifice essential to the winning of this war. But, Mr. President, it is not a test of heroism, neither is it a proof of statesmanship, to permit the bearing of unnecessary and avoidable burdens, or to permit the making of unnecessary and avoidable sacrifices. It is the part of statesmanship to obviate every possible burden and to obviate every possible sacrifice. I believe there will be burdens enough, there will be sacrifices enough, which can not be avoided, without permitting those which can by any possibility be avoided.

I wish to have read here a table of percentages, first showing the ratio of farm hands and other classes drawn, from page 95 of the hearings before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Then, on page 96, I wish to have read into the RECORD another table or statement; because, while a larger percentage of farm hands have been drawn than from any other class of registrants, that still does not tell the full story, because in the agricultural States of the West 77 per cent of the registrants passed the physical examination. Some of the States went higher than that. In the great industrial States some of them fell as low as 53 per cent. In Pennsylvania the number who passed the physical examination was only 53, in Connecticut it was only 53, in Vermont it was 56, whereas in North Dakota it was 79 per cent, in Nebraska 78 per cent, and the average was around 77 per cent, except in some of the extreme Southern States where there is a large colored population.

I ask to have read first the marked place on page 95 and then the marked place on page 96.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

I have gone through all the classes, and here is what I have found: Agriculture, forestry, and animal husbandry, total registered, 2,564,133; total accepted, 217,285; per cent taken of this registration, 8.47 per cent. Actors, artists, showmen, etc., 7.85 per cent. Breweries and other liquor factories, 8.38 per cent. Banking, brokerage, insurance, 6.83 per cent. Textile mills, 6.30 per cent. Barbers, bartenders, saloon keepers, etc., 7.99 per cent.

* * * * * * *

Here are the figures by States: South Dakota, 85.87 per cent of those that were called to be examined passed.

Senator PAGE. Of the farm boys?

Mr. SIMPSON. No; of the State; it is an agricultural State. Nebraska, 79.85; Wyoming, 78.47. Those were the three highest. Then I took the three lowest: Pensylvania, 53.33; Connecticut, 53.70; Vermont, 56.18.

Senator GRONNA. Have you gotten North Dakota there?

Mr. SIMPSON. All the agricultural States run about 77 per cent, except these three that were exceptionally high, and when you get down in the extreme Southern States, down among the negroes, they run a little lower. But the manufacturing and mining States all run much lower.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report on the soldiers' and sailors' civil-rights bill.

The report was agreed to.

WAR FINANCE CORPORATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3714) to provide further for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think when we adjourned yesterday the Senate had under consideration an amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the amendment under consideration is that offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] to the committee amendment on page 9 of the bill.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I believe that is the amendment that I offered on behalf of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. The Senator is now present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, line 20, after the word "whose," it is proposed to insert "bonded indebtedness is not in excess of its actually invested capital and assets, and whose."

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I may say that without the authority of the Senator from Colorado I permitted to be inserted yesterday the words "and assets." I did not think they were necessary; and I now ask the permission of the Senate to withdraw them, so that the amendment may be turned over to the Senator from Colorado as he gave it to me.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, since the Senator from New Hampshire was so kind as to look after this amendment during my necessary absence yesterday, I shall be bound by whatever suggestion or arrangement he may have made regarding it.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I did not commit the Senator or myself. I said I saw no objection to the insertion of those words, but I did not feel at all sure the Senator would not object; and I shall be glad to ask unanimous consent, which probably will be granted, to have them stricken out, if that is not entirely satisfactory.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I want to express my obligation to the Senate for permitting this amendment to go over until to-day, because of my detention in a very important committee meeting, although I have no doubt that the discussion of the amendment under the direction of the Senator from New Hampshire was quite as illuminating to the Senate as any explanation that I can make of the purpose of the amendment.

I am not satisfied, Mr. President, with subsection "(d)," even with the amendment which I have offered to it. The vast range of authority which it confers upon the new corporation will undoubtedly be exercised for the purpose of safeguarding the interests of the Government at all times; and yet we know that where too much is left to the discretion of an administrative body, appeals in individual cases sometimes are so plausible and so earnest as to mislead or confuse the judgment, resulting in more or less injury to the public interests.

This subsection, as I understand it, is designed to invest the Finance Corporation with authority to deal with enterprises, mostly public utilities, whose financial condition absolutely requires relief, and who are unable to obtain it in any other direction or from any other source. They are not in proper condition to receive advances from their usual sources of borrowing. They are unable to meet and tide over the maturity of obligations the default of which threatens them with complete disaster. At the same time, we assume for the purposes of the bill that the character of the business with which they are occupied and which they are conducting is essential to the prosecution of the war. The cessation of it will therefore tend to impede the progress of the prosecution of the war, or at least make the possibilities of efficiency less than would otherwise be the case.

I concede fully, Mr. President, the essential necessity, if we are to legislate at all upon the general subject of the bill, of making provision to meet such cases when they become urgent, but it is an unfortunate fact that during the days when speculation was rife and investments were easily secured many of the public utilities of the country issued securities which frequently were in excess of the actual value of the property.

To use a common expression of the trade, many of them capitalized the future, capitalized their so-called intangible wealth, and transformed it into real money by placing these huge issues upon the market and selling them sometimes at par and more frequently at much less than par—sometimes at par with a bonus of common stock. Fundamentally the practice is indefensible. I might go further and say that it is dishonest.

I do not believe, Mr. President, that the Government should come to the rescue of those speculative concerns which in defiance of good business ideas and of common sense have yielded to the temptation offered by an easy market of placing bond issues upon the country in excess of the actual capital invested. If concerns of that sort get into trouble because of our present stringent financial war conditions, the chances are 100 to 1 that the trouble has resulted from their misconduct and not from any other cause whatever.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. HOLLIS. Would the Senator extend the principle for which he is contending to earnings made by the company and put back in the property and represent it, say, by stock dividends? That raises, I assume, this question. Would the Senator go as far as that?

Mr. THOMAS. If the amount of earnings placed into the capital as stock dividends has become sufficient in amount to offset the difference between the original capital invested and the amount of bond issue, yes; but I do not believe that there are many such cases.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] during the first day's discussion of the bill said that the traction company, the trolley company, operating the street railways in his city represented an actual investment of $100,000, but that the bond issue of the company which had been negotiated was 400 per cent of that amount; that is to say, $400,000. Now, that is a typical case. Unfortunately it is not a unique one. It has its imitations as well as its precedents from one end of this country to the other. I might refer to one or two, perhaps, in my own State, but that one illustration is sufficient.

Now, why should a concern like that be permitted to fall back upon the generosity of the Government and obtain relief from the condition which it now finds itself in because of its improvidence? I want and always have wanted to discourage that sort of wildcat financiering conducted on the part of men who know better or on the part of those who can with some propriety plead ignorance, and I know of nothing that would encourage the continuation of such practices more than the knowledge of the fact that if trouble comes the Government will put its powerful shoulder to their little wheels and lift them out of the ruts.

Concerns of that kind, Mr. President, generally speaking, meet disaster sooner or later even in the most prosperous times, and that means receivership. I can not conceive of any of those enterprises whose existence is a necessity to Government purposes which would not be run as well if not better by the companies if they are in the hands of a receiver. Of course, something depends upon the competency of the official appointed to fill that position, but surely there is nothing urgent in the event of the translation of the company's affairs from the hands of the concern to those of the court.

So I think this amendment is desirable, and I am willing to limit it to those companies whose earnings have been invested in their capital to the equivalent of the difference between the original capital and the bond issue. But I think we should safeguard the Government as to this very important matter, for when the mass of these companies is concerned it is not a small matter; it is liable to run into the millions, as everything else does at the present time.

I think, Mr. President, that I have completed all that I care to say upon the amendment, and I am quite willing to submit it to the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. HOLLIS. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the change I made in the amendment. I believe I have a right to do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The Senator has that right.

Mr. THOMAS. As I understand the Senator's amendment, it would cover the point about which he just interrogated me, and I am willing to accept it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, line 20, in the committee amendment, after the word "whose," insert the words "bonded indebtedness is not in excess of its actually invested capital and assets, and whose."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is now on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I had printed and laid on the table a suggested amendment, which I called to the attention of the chairman of the committee and asked him to carefully consider.

Mr. THOMAS. Is the Senator speaking about the amendment which I offered?

Mr. SAULSBURY. No, sir; I am speaking of an amendment which I offered to this same amendment of the committee which has been amended on motion of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. It is another amendment the Senator is speaking about?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Another amendment. I wish to call the attention of the chairman to the proposed amendment, which has been printed, and to state the object of the amendment, which I think will assist the object intended to be accomplished by the bill. I do not suppose that any of us would be likely to vote for a bill of this character except as a war measure, and I conceive its chief object is stabilizing the money market during the time the Government has practically monopolized the money market for its own benefit.

The clause we have under consideration is intended undoubtedly to relieve the condition in which the many public-utility companies of the country have found themselves, in many cases entierly through their own fault, in some cases, of course, without their own fault. We all know there has been almost for the last generation a tremendous capitalization of public-utility companies. That has caused the heaping of mortgages on top of other mortgages, which have not been in all cases very well secured.

But there are many mortgages issued by these public-utility companies as underlying liens, and afterwards the company has been sold out to some other company and has been recapitalized, leaving the underlying mortgages perfectly good. In the present condition of the money market it is not possible as the bonds secured by the underlying mortgage fall due to get renewals of the lien or to get extensions from the obligation holders under those mortgages.

The amendment which I suggested for the consideration merely of the chairman of the committee would operate by means of what might be called a temporary stay during the period of the war, where security holders seem to be unreasonable and where the obligor company or its successor is willing to make a fair arrangement with the bondholders. In such case the directors of the finance corporation created by the bill could withhold a certificate from, we will say, the committee of bondholders seeking to foreclose the mortgage, and in that way through the amendment which I have proposed foreclosure proceedings could not be prosecuted during the period of the war on the mortgage which secured the bonds. My idea, Mr. President, is that the question of the reasonableness of the proposed terms of extension during the war of the bonds secured by these underlying mortgages might be safely left to the directors of this business corporation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me see if I understand the Senator. Does the Senator mean that no foreclosure proceedings would be entertained by the court unless the plaintiffs in that proceeding had a certificate of this committee that the foreclosure would not be against the public interest?

Mr. SAULSBURY. That is the suggestion of the amendment, and I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to this fact——

Mr. SIMMONS. Then the Senator of course means the alternative of that. If they said it would be against the public interest, they would issue no certificate at all.

Mr. SAULSBURY. They would issue no certificate. The certificate would be a prerequisite to the foreclosure of any mortgage exceeding $1,000,000 in amount. Of course, if the chairman of the committee sees fit to adopt this amendment I am perfectly willing we should make that amount anything reasonable. I put in the amount of $1,000,000 because that would practically cover all the serious securities that are falling due the present year.

I wish to call the attention of the chairman to the fact that the effect of this amendment would be very greatly to aid the object of the corporation, which is created, by preventing demands coming into the money market in large amounts where a very little inconvenience would occur to the holders of bonds under the mortgages by the stay from bringing their suits during the war.

It is not a great hardship on me if I hold obligations secured by a mortgage and have held those obligations for years to say to me you may have exactly what you have been getting in the way of interest. The companies, as a rule, are quite willing to make better arrangements, for example, to increase the rate of interest from 5 per cent to 6 per cent in order to obtain the credit during this time of stress in the money market, where the Government is taking up available funds which may be invested.

I shall not press this amendment unless it appeals to the good judgment of the chairman of the committee, but I suggest to him that it would very greatly aid, in my opinion, the end aimed at by the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, what the Senator proposes is nothing more nor less than a moratorium. He proposes to vest in this committee the power of determining for the court the question whether it shall be permitted to proceed in a foreclosure proceeding instituted by the holder of the bonds of any corporation. It is not only a moratorium but it vests the power of determining whether that drastic course shall be pursued in the committee. I voted for and Congress has passed a moratorium so far as suits against enlisted men, men who are out of the country and engaged in the service of the country and in its defense, are concerned, but I do not think we have yet come to a point when we ought to declare a moratorium of any kind against the collection of obligations.

Of course, I appreciate the purpose which the Senator from Delaware has in view. I appreciate that in this situation it would afford very great relief to a very great many concerns in this country which are in dire need of relief, but I think it is rather a remedy that ought not to be resorted to except in very extreme conditions, and I do not think those conditions have yet been reached in this country. How soon we may have to come to it I do not know. I think we have not come to it yet, and if this bill shall pass I think it will afford such relief in the financial crisis with which we are now apparently threatened that probably we will be able to get along without having even later to resort to any such remedy as the one proposed by the Senator from Delaware. I have talked with several of the members of the committee about it, Mr. President, because I understood the very generous attitude of the Senator from Delaware with reference to myself and his willingness to withdraw his amendment if I would express myself against it. I did not wish to take that responsibility myself and I have talked with a number of the members of the committee about it. I am not speaking now for myself alone but for the committee. We do not feel that we can accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, under those circumstances I shall not press the amendment. I am glad the committee have considered this matter, because my impression is that the committee may feel it incumbent upon them later to introduce an amendment of this character to the present act, which I think the Senator incorrectly characterizes as a moratorium. It is merely a stay in a very limited number of cases where the directors of this finance corporation themselves would determine that it would be for the public interest. But I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware withdraws his amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. I gave notice day before yesterday of another amendment to subsection (d). It is the insertion of the word "adequate," on page 10.

Mr. SIMMONS. That has already been adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment has been agreed to, the Chair is informed.

Mr. THOMAS. It was done during my absence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. HALE. I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. HOLLIS. The parliamentary situation is that we are now considering the committee amendment at the bottom of page 9 and the top of page 10, and amendments to that amendment are now in order to the exclusion of other amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HOLLIS. The purpose of subdivision (d) found on page 9 is to extend direct help to corporations owning or controlling railroads or other public utilities and to firms, corporations, or associations whose operations are necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war. The bill as it came to the Finance Committee made these beneficences applicable to persons as well as to firms, corporations, or associations. The Finance Committee evidently thinks that persons conducting just as big a business as anyone else are not entitled to the same relief as corporations.

I wonder if this was called to the attention of the chairman of the Finance Committee, and if it was intended to exclude men who might need relief and who are doing just the same class of business as corporations. I tried to study out some reason for it. The only reason I can think of is that it was intended to exclude farmers. Farmers are conducting a business that is more important to the Nation than anything else, except the production of munitions of war. It does not make any difference if it was the distinguished Senator from North Dakota carrying on thousands of acres perhaps of wheat farming, a most essential industry, whereas some little corporation with $10,000 worth of capital stock and no real assets might come to this corporation and get relief; individuals could not.

I shall move, first, to insert, in line 19, before the word "firm" the word "person." Then later I shall move to insert the word "person" in line 16. I now offer the first amendment, on page 9, line 19, before the word "firm" to insert the word "person."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say that the committee did consider that question very carefully, and they thought that the word "person" covered such a multitude of people, many with a capital of but a few dollars, that at any time can secure assistance from the regular channels of business and are provided for——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator think that the word "person" takes in any wider range of business in a material sense than the word "corporation"? Every imaginable business in the world is within the corporate powers of corporations, and there are all kinds of corporations, some of them promoting wildcat propositions and as totally without merit as any individual business ever engaged in.

It seems to me as far as that section is concerned that the discretion vested in the corporation to pass upon these applications for financial assis ance is just as wide under the present bill as it would be if the word "person" were inserted, except that it would be confined to corporations and exclude those that were not incorporated. Yet it would cover business without merit as well as business with merit and business of every imaginable class.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that leaving out the word "person," as I said before, would limit the number who could appeal direct to this corporation for assistance and receive bonds from the corporation upon securities that they may offer. If the word "person" were put into this paragraph, there would scarcely be a person in the United States who could not appeal to the corporation for assistance. We do not want to break the law down. Appeals could be made, and no doubt would be made, where no public interest was at stake. Political reasons, financial reasons, and other reasons would be brought to bear upon the directors, and the time of the board would be consumed in listening to such appeals.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield further to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMOOT. In just a moment I will yield.

It is not the intention of the framers of the bill to allow the corporation to issue as low an amount as $100 worth of bonds in one transaction. It is only in special cases that the advances could be made, and they should be made only in a case where it is to the public interest to advance money, and where the parties wanting an advance can not secure the money from any other source and in amounts that can not be secured from the usual sources. Now I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have no particular reason to interrupt the Senator or to participate in the debate, except that I was present and heard the Senator's answer to the proposition of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], and it struck me as being very unsound, if the Senator will pardon me; I mean from a logical standpoint. Does the Senator mean to say that the magic name of corporation will exclude applications for political purposes or due to political influences? Does the Senator mean to say that you can avoid that by forming a corporation?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, you will cut out at least 99 per cent of them. I do not say that members of a corporation could not use political influence—I have not made such a statement—but when the door is thrown open to every person in the United States and invite every person to make a direct application for an advance, no matter how small the amount, I think it is going too far.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I agree with the Senator that there ought to be certain guards and certain precautions which would prevent the abuse of the power of this corporation in the use of the credit and finances of the Government, but I fail to see how the Senator can even contend that you are going to avoid abuses by limiting it to a corporation. There is not any abuse in financial business that has ever been perpetrated by an individual in business that has not been perpetrated by a corporation, and if the Senator wants a measure of some kind to distinguish the bad from the good and to confine the operation of this Government finance corporation to sound business propositions, he will have to find some other distinction merely than the difference between a man, a natural person, and an artificial person called a corporation. There is not any possibility of accomplishing the object the Senator says is in view by using that test. You will have to get some other test.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah has not tried to differentiate between a person and a corporation as far as the abuses that may come under this bill are concerned other than this, that where there is one corporation that would make an application for assistance there would be hundreds of persons who could and no doubt would do it; and if you use the word "person," as I stated, and if the person wanted $100, under such a provision he could apply to the corporation. We have already provided in paragraph (b) that all such cases can be taken care of, and the Government will be a great deal better secured if the corporation does not advance 1 cent to others than the banks of the country, for the banks are compelled to put up 25 per cent more security than the amount of money which is advanced to them.

This paragraph of section 6 does not make any such requirement. It was supposed that it would take care of exceptional cases; but in the way it is now drawn, I want to say to the Senate, if the word "person" is inserted, I do not know what the result will be.

Exceptional cases, in the first place, were to take care of the public utilities and the railroads of the country. The public utilities of the country almost universally to-day are losing money. Their expenses run from 60 to 100 per cent more than they did three years ago; and yet the rate they are allowed to charge for the service has been in only a very few cases increased. It was thought by the framers of this bill that unless there was relief given to these public-utility corporations, and given in a special way, as provided for in this paragraph, very few of them could exist much longer.

During the year 1918 there is to be refunded by public-utility corporations $233,000,000. The securities that they gave for the existing bond issue, and falling due this year, are not as good as they were when the bonds were first issued, because the earning capacity of these corporations has been greatly decreased. As I before stated, few of them are making expenses.

In the case of persons or of corporations other than public-utility corporations, they have the right, whenever the cost of producing their product increases, to advance the price of the product and they have done so in nearly every instance of which I have heard. As the cost has increased, so has the price to the consumer been increased, but that is not the case with a public-utility corporation. I want to say to the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] and to the Senate that I have no doubt, if this war goes on for a couple of years more, there will be advances made to public-utility corporations in this country upon securities that at the time the securities are offered will not be worth the amount of money advanced on them; and if the Government of the United States were forced to realize on the securities in cases such as I have mentioned they could not get their money back.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Then the Senator from Utah admits that there is no absolute guaranty of safety merely by the name of a corporation?

Mr. SMOOT. By the name of a public-utility corporation?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President, not under this paragraph; but there would be in paragraphs (b) and (c), the paragraphs referring to the banks.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator does not contend that we can avoid the difficulties he mentions by favoring corporations over others?

Mr. SMOOT. No; but you would multiply the difficulties by thousands.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is not a question of numbers. There has got to be some discrimination in the administration of this law. It is just as easy for a board of directors to tell whether a business conducted by an individual is a sound business as it is to tell whether one conducted by a corporation is a sound business.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Washington to consider the case just as it will be presented to this corporation. The Senator knows that if there was an application made by any person in the United States for an advance, say, of $100, it would require the expenditure of $100 on the part of the corporation to make an investigation, if they should decide to do so, as to the security offered. The board would not know the individual's financial standing or responsibility, so there would have to be an investigation in order that the board might ascertain whether or not the security which the person offered was adequate, and it would cost perhaps as much to make the investigation as the amount the individual would desire to have advanced. If we go further than the committee has gone, I am quite sure there will be tens of thousands of such cases; and it would be a physical impossibility for this corporation to pass upon a tithe of them.

The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] suggests that the corporation is not compelled to make the loans to these persons; but what would be the result if a hundred thousand such applications were made and no action should be taken? Of course, there would be an outcry against the corporation throughout the United States. I myself think that the corporation would do everything it could to obviate just such a position as they would be placed in under such circumstances.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the senior Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. Did I understand the Senator to say that the question of either inserting or leaving out the word "person" was considered by the committee?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly it was, Mr. President.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say it was not considered at any time when I was present.

Mr. SMOOT. That may be.

Mr. McCUMBER. I submit to the Senator that I can not see that the insertion of that word would do any particular harm. Let me call the Senator's attention to this: There are two purposes in subdivision (d); one is to extend these advantages directly to the corporation controlling directly or through stock ownership any railroad or other public utility. That is one of the purposes. The second purpose is:

But any firm—

And I call the attention of the Senator from Washington to the fact that it does not refer to corporations only; that it is not limited to corporations, because it includes—any firm, corporation, or association conducting an established and going business—

Then—whose operations are necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war.

I understand that was to cover certain cases. For instance, there might be a munition plant, or something of that character, that might not be incorporated at all In attempting to get parts for our ships, we might have one plant making bolts of a certain size and another little plant making bolts of a different character, and such plants might be scattered all over the country, and some of them might be owned individually. If such an individual needed funds in order to expand his business in order to meet the requirements of the Government under subdivision (b), he would be entitled to apply, provided it tended directly to affect the Government in its war work. I notice in the very beginning of the bill that it provides—

That for the purpose of affording financial assistance, either directly or indirectly—

The provisions use the same words—to persons, firms, corporations, and associations.

It seems to me that this other provision was intended to be just exactly as broad as the first subdivision; and I, myself, can not see any reason why we can not trust the same corporation, the same officials, to make the distinction of what is proper and what is improper in one subdivision as we would trust them in the other. After all, it is a power that may be subject to abuse, as are all of these extraordinary powers, but I can see no good reason why the word "persons" should not be included. I do not think there is any more danger of abuse in this case than there is danger of abuse under the first section of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as I now recall, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] was not present at the committee meeting at which this matter was finally decided; but, as I have stated, the question was discussed by the commit ee, and the committee decided that it would be unwise to include the word "persons" in this paragraph. This paragraph is not the same as paragraph (b) because in that paragraph it specifically states what the amount of the security shall be, and not only the amount of security, but that it shall pass through the regular banking channels of the country, and the whole credit of the bank will be behind every one of the securities offered to the corporation for the purpose of securing the credit asked for.

Mr. President, there is no question that it is the intention of the administration or of the framers of this bill to interfere with the regular course of business just as little as it is possible to do, and yet not to allow the business concerns of this country to fall on account of the Government having monopolized the money market; but if the Senate wants to invite and authorize every person in the United States to come directly to this corporation, and for this corporation to issue its bonds for any amount an individual may want—I care not how small the amount may be—then, of course, we should include the word "persons." I desire to say to the Senate, however, that if that is done it will be a very dangerous proposition, and that, instead of the directorate of this corporation being 5 in number, we had better make it about 105, for the applications will come to it by the hundreds of thousands.

I do not know that I have anything more to say upon this subject, Mr. President, except to repeat that I think it would be unwise to include individual persons in this provision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. HOLLIS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Henderson	Norris	Simmons
Bankhead	Hollis	Nugent	Smoot
Beckham	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Sterling
Borah	Jones, Wash.	Owen	Stone
Colt	Kendrick	Page	Sutherland
Curtis	Kirby	Poindexter	Swanson
Fernald	Lodge	Pomerene	Thomas
Gallinger	McCumber	Ransdell	Thompson
Gerry	McKellar	Reed	Tillman
Gronna	McNary	Robinson	Trammell
Hale	Martin	Saulsbury	Warren
Harding	Nelson	Shafroth	Watson
Hardwick	New	Sheppard	Williams

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to announce that the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] are detained on business of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. KENDRICK. The junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] is absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, before this amendment is rejected I want the Senate, or at least a quorum of the body, to know what it is. It has been charged that this bill is to be passed for the benefit of a few distressed millionaires. Now, on the confession of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], it appears that it is being passed for the benefit of corporations, and not for the benefit of persons. The bill as it came from the Treasury Department to the Finance Committee provided that direct advances could be made to persons, firms, corporations, or associations. The Finance Committee has seen fit to withdraw that privilege from persons even in essential industries, so that no farmer, no matter how large his business may be, no matter how many thousands of acres he cultivates, if he is in distress can come to this war bank for relief; and the Senator from Utah airily says, "Well, he can go to his bank; he is not a corporation, and no one but a corporation can expect this assistance under this bill." I have seen a good deal of legislation passed in recent years where corporations were discriminated against, but this is the first attempt I have seen since I have been in the Senate to discriminate in favor of corporations.

There is no magic in the word "corporation." It has an alluring sound to hungry mortals; it is likely to have officers with large salaries; it may or may not have; but in my part of the country there are a good many private persons who organize public utilities, waterworks, electric-light plants, and so forth, and they are just as much entitled, yes, more entitled, to advances from this corporation as is some one who organizes a corporation.

Now, why do individuals organize corporations? Usually to avoid individual liability; for the same reason that some men put their property in their wife's name so that they can do business, and, if they fail, they will have something left. A corporation is not entitled to as good credit as an individual. Many things can be done by corporations in the way of irregular finance that an individual can not do without running the risk of getting into jail.

I have not heard any reason why persons should be discriminated against under this bill. The Senator from Utah said because there are so many of them. Well, I hope that the benefits of this bill are not to be narrowed down to the few capitalists who took enough interest in it to come here to Washington and testify before the Finance Committee. I hope that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. I want to ask the Senator if there is any reason whatever why, if aid is to be extended under this bill at all, it should not be extended just as well to a person conducting an established business whose operations are contributory to the prosecution of the war as to a corporation under similar circumstances?

Mr. HOLLIS. I can not see any reason. I think the reason is even stronger in the case of individuals, because corporations, if they have such fine credit, can go to the banks and get credit when persons can not. There is no reason for the discrimination, and none can be pointed out.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] that, if a person is conducting a business that is contributing to the success of the war, that person ought to have just the same measure of aid from the Government or from the Government finance corporation as a corporation ought to have, subject to exactly the same limitations as to the amount, kind, character, volume, and soundness of security; and, to my mind at least, in spite of the very plausible argument of my friend from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], there is no reason whatever for the distinction between them. I think the bill as originally drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury is right in that regard.

But, Mr. President, I am opposed to this bill in its entirety. I am opposed to the principle on which it rests. I am opposed to the things that it seeks to accomplish; that is, to their accomplishment in the way and manner suggested and proposed by this bill; and, if the Senate were in a frame of mind to weigh an argument on this question, I would have some hope of my ability to convince it that this measure is totally unnecessary, for the present at least; but it seems to me, Mr. President, that we are rapidly getting into, if we have not already arrived at, that feverish state of mind where when somebody can point out an evil only one remedy will be considered for that situation and that the remedy suggested by administrative officers, whatever view the legislative branch may have as to the proper remedy to be applied.

What is this bill? Where does it come from? What does it propose? Whatever the evils that it seeks to remedy and whatever methods it employs in the effort to meet and cure those evils, this bill has a double-barreled purpose—first, to provide for a change indirectly in our banking laws, and, second, to provide for the licensing of everything that might be termed "big business" by the National Government, the second proposition being wholly unheard of under the American system of government, wholly dangerous to the liberties of the American people, and wholly unnecessary for the adequate and vigorous prosecution of this war.

The report submitted by the Finance Committee is practically nothing except the printing of Mr. McAdoo's statement in support of this bill. The committee does not venture to give us any independent reasons that it may have of its own or any independent views, if, perchance, it entertains any, about the subject, but merely concludes, with some discretion, I reckon, considering what this bill really is, that it will justify it in the words of its able proponent, and therefore gives us Mr. McAdoo's argument in support of the bill.

Mr. McAdoo says this is the reason for the bill:

In Europe—

And you must remember in these days that it is fashionable to model everything we do on Europe and European institutions, instead of being true to American principles. Mr. McAdoo says:

In Europe central banks are permitted to grant to banks and bankers loans upon stocks and bonds upon certain well-defined terms. The Federal reserve act does not provide for these, and the war finance corporation is designed as a war emergency to fill this gap.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HARDWICK. I will; yes, sir.

Mr. NELSON. This bill conveys one lesson to us. When the Monetary Commission made their report—I do this with the permission of the Senator from Georgia——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield, of course.

Mr. NELSON. When the Monetary Commission made their report, they recommended one central bank. That report was ignored when the Democratic Party came into power. It said that it was dangerous to create one central bank; that we must have the banking systems distributed into 12 regional banks; that we must not adhere to the system that they have in Europe, of having one central bank. Now, what is this? This is simply supplying the lack of that legislation and attempting to supply it in rather a clumsy way by creating a central bank for the whole country to do what none of these 12 reserve banks could do; that is all.

I am not saying that I am opposed to the bill; but the very principle on which this bill is based, and the justification of it, is that none of the reserve banks are competent to perform this function; that we need a central banking institution to do that work that was omitted in the currency legislation.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota undoubtedly has abundant ground for that statement. When we enacted the Federal reserve banking law I did not delude myself for one moment about what we were doing. After denouncing for years Senator Aldrich and his commission we were practically adopting, with some modifications, the Aldrich idea. The result was the Federal reserve banking system, which has been the subject of extravagant encomiums, of praise that to some extent was justified and to some extent, in my opinion, was extravagant, from one end of this country to another, until the country rang with the praises of this marvelous institution which had been recently created. And yet what do we now find? When the very first test comes for the much-vaunted and much-praised Federal reserve banking system its advocates and proponents, almost without exception, lay down and surrender their arms without firing a shot and admit that it is utterly inadequate to carry us in stormy weather, however valuable it was in sunshine.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HOLLIS. I wish to say that the real friends of the Federal reserve act, so far as I have heard them express themselves, are opposed to this bill. The Federal reserve act was intended to ride like a ship in time of storm, and now that the storm has come they are throwing over the ballast and putting on more sail.

Mr. HARDWICK. Exactly. The statement of the Senator from New Hampshire does him credit, and I am glad to hear him make it on the floor, for he has been one of the stalwart champions of that system, and it is to his credit that he is unwilling to throw it overboard when the first storm comes. I wish as much could be said for the position of other Senators and other Members of another body who were strong in their advocacy of that banking system, and who once contended that it was amply sufficient for times of storm as well as for periods of sunshine.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Just for the RECORD I wish to say to the Senator that the Secretary of the Treasury and two members of the Federal Reserve Board appeared before the committee in behalf of this legislation. I will say to the Senator that I am not enamored with it, but I wish to say, further, that in private conversation with members of the Federal Reserve Board I have been told that the members of that board are in favor of this legislation. It does seem to me that the members of that board, particularly the governor and the Secretary of the Treasury, are certainly friendly to the Federal reserve banking system, and the statement made by the Senator from New Hampshire must apply to some friends of the system outside of the members of the board and the Secretary of the Treasury, if they are unfriendly to this legislation.

Mr. HOLLIS. I am talking about Members of Congress in both branches.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now, Mr. President, if I may proceed for just a moment, it is demonstration complete. The words of the Secretary of the Treasury afford it. What does he say is the reason for the passage of this bill?

In Europe central banks are permitted to grant to banks and bankers loans upon stocks and bonds upon certain well-defined terms. The Federal reserve act does not provide for these, and the war finance corporation is designed as a war emergency to fill this gap.

That is what he says; that is what he means; and that is what it is. Fill this gap? Why not fill it by amending your banking law? If these stocks and bonds and securities must be admitted as collateral upon which the Federal reserve banks can make loans, why could you not do it by amending your banking laws? And if your banking system is worth a cent, if it is worth the paper it is written on, to say nothing of the extravagant campaign encomiums that have been heaped upon its devoted head, it looks to me like you would do that instead of throwing it away the first time even the appearance of a squall darkens a corner of the sky.

No; but it is not fashionable to do that in these days. Instead of making a simple amendment to the banking laws changing the kind of securities that these banks may accept for loans we have got to have a great Government corporation, with thousands and thousands of employees and millions and millions of expense and billions and billions of bond issues, until old John Law, if he were alive to-day, would roll his eyes in envy at the very sight of it, to take the place of a simple proposition to amend the banking laws.

We have got to have a Shipping Corporation, the Government running the railroads, the Government running business credits in this country; we have got to have centralization at the expense of State governments, centralization at the expense of individualism in this Republic, until we have heaped upon our people a system of laws that when the sum total is carefully weighed is just about as obnoxious as the system under which the Russians lived before they got rid of the Czar.

Mr. REED. Otherwise it is all right, I suppose? [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDWICK. No; otherwise it is all wrong.

Now, let us see. The Secretary gave a few more reasons; and the further you go into the reasons, if you feel like you have got any right to an opinion of your own, the stronger your opinion gets that there is very little reason back of it all, except the desire of certain people to grasp a great deal more power in every line and in every direction, whether it is really necessary to have it in order to prosecute this war or not.

The Secretary told us what the primary purpose of this legislation was. I want to give it to you again, from "Secretary McAdoo on purpose":

The bill has been drawn with the double purpose of restricting unnecessary capital expenditures and of providing facilities for aiding those industries whose operations are necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war. Broadly speaking, all these are "war industries." The bill is purely a war measure; designed to conserve the supply of labor and materials for the purposes of the war, and to help supply the war's financial requirements, and to give them a first claim on capital seeking investment in like manner as the war's material requirements have been given a first claim on productions. By the term "war industries" is meant not only those industries turning out the actual munitions of war but also all those supplying any of the other elements of production or distribution in an industrial structure designed to meet the diversified requirements of the war. The bill is not intended to interfere with the continued existence and operation of existing industries, even though not remotely contributory to the prosecution of the war.

Yet I will show you in another place where he says the very reverse of that is true:

Such industries should not, however, be permitted to assert a first claim on fresh capital or be considered until the requirements of the Government and of the "war industries" have been fully met.

The proposed bill creates the War Finance Corporation to regulate the sale of new issues of securities and to make loans of its funds or its credit in aid of "war industries." It prohibits any person, firm, corporation, or association from selling or offering for sale any securities issued after the date of the approval of the act unless a license for such sale or offering (if required by the corporation) shall have been obtained from the corporation. Through its regulation of security issues the corporation will be able to keep the field somewhat clear for the borrowing operations of the Government, and at the same time will stand ready and able to aid "war industries" whose financial requirements may be rendered difficult if not impossible to meet in competition with Government loans. This regulation of security issues will also tend to prevent the further diversion of labor and materials into nonessential industries.

Mr. President, it is plain from the remarks of the Secretary that this bill is based on almost, if not quite, the identical principle on which the railroad bill was bottomed, namely, to use the expression that was used on this floor yesterday by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], I think, on the proposition that the Government, through its necessity to float these liberty loans, had practically commandeered the money market; therefore that the Government, having commandeered the money market for war loans, must afford some substitute for the forms of business which otherwise would be injuriously affected. I think I have stated that proposition fairly.

Well, now, let us see if that is true. Does the necessity to float these immense war loans permanently disarrange the money market? It does temporarily, I admit; and some change in the banking laws may be necessary, and doubtless is necessary. Some liberalizing of those laws with respect to the kind of security that is to be accepted during the war by the Federal reserve banks may be, and probably is, necessary; but further than that there is no necessity. This money that we spend on these great war contracts is not burned up. It is not consumed in fire. It is not subtracted from the sum total of the national wealth. Not even any considerable proportion of it now goes abroad. I think we have gotten through with paying off "our allies"—I hope so, at least for a time. Most of it is spent in this country. It circulates from hand to hand; it is paid out on Government contracts, and the contractors spend it for meat and bread and heat and light, when they are allowed to buy heat, and light if it is not interfered with, and everything else that mortal man needs. It is simply swapping dollars and changing hands. It is in the country all the while; and business, subject to the prior necessities of these people and of these Government securities, will readily and promptly readjust itself to that condition.

Some statement has been made somewhere by somebody on this floor, I think, to the effect that this bill is modeled on something that has been done in England. I am not sure but that one of the Senators on the Finance Committee made that statement. If so, I want to take issue with him. Not yet has such a tremendous power over English business been authorized by any law that anybody has dared to suggest to the English Parliament; not yet. They have some sort of an arrangement regulating the kind and character of loans that shall be made, that is voluntary among the business men in England, which may have the indorsement of boards of trade, of great banks, and of other financial institutions; but not yet in an English-speaking land, among a people who are not thoroughly Prussianized, has any such drastic suggestion for the life-and-death control of Government over business and finance been presented to an English Parliament. We are pioneers along that delightful line.

Section 7 of this bill, Mr. President, is, to my mind, the most monstrous proposition in this bill or in any similar bill that ever was suggested for the consideration of a legislative body that was representing a free people. I want to call your attention to just what it does, just what can be done under section 7, and to the potentialities for evil, for ruin, for despotism, that lurk and lie in it:

That for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war—

And, by the way, no matter what it is desired to do, everything is to assist in the prosecution of the war. Whether it is really for that purpose or not, whether it is really or even moderately connected with that purpose or not, it is fashionable now to hang everything on a provision like that, and to start off with a prelude like that—and providing for the public security and defense through the restriction of unnecessary capital expenditures—

That is a pretty drastic proposition for a free people—that if a man has capital he will not be allowed to expend it if he wants to, or to invest it in whatever way he pleases, or to throw it away if he wants to. That is a new and novel position to take among a free people, even in time of war—

there shall be appointed by the Federal Reserve Board, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury—

By the way, I think it would have been much wiser to have this committee nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate than the other one that the bill provides for, because this is the committee that is to hold the sword of Damocles over American business, that is to exercise the power of life and death over American enterprise; and it strikes me that they had better be appointed by the President and selected by and with the advice and consent of the Senate if you are going to have such an institution at all in this free land of ours.

But I will read the bill as it is—there shall be appointed by the Federal Reserve Board, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, a capital issues committee, to consist of five members, of whom at least three shall be members of the Federal Reserve Board, which may, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by such committee, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury—

Why is that necessary if he is a member of the committee? Is he to have a veto power over it all?—

investigate and license, or refuse to license, the sale, or offering for sale or for subscription, of securities, as hereinafter provided.

Senators, what is that proposition? That an institution in my State or in your State, local to Georgia or local to New York, not engaged, as far as the requirements of the law are concerned, in interstate commerce at all, subject, if the dual form of government still survives in America, to local regulation and to local regulation alone, shall not even offer a share of stock for sale unless some Secretary of the Treasury and his board up here in Washington agree and assent thereto.

Such committee shall, however, grant licenses—

It seems that you are going to put this country on the license basis for and during the term of the war, with the hope that we will be able to get it off as soon as the war is ended.

Such committee shall, however, grant licenses for any such sale, or any such offering for sale or for subscription, which it shall determine to be consistent with the foregoing purposes. The terms during which the several members of such committee shall respectively hold office shall be determined by the Federal Reserve Board, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the compensation of the several members of such committee who are not members of the Federal Reserve Board shall be $7,500 per annum, to be paid by the corporation. No person, firm, corporation, or association—

You will remember this dispute about "person" and "corporation." When it comes to prohibiting anybody from selling anything they propose to make it "person, firm, corporation, or association," so that the prohibition on American business is as broad as language can make it, even if the privileges to American business are to be narrower and more restricted.

No person, firm, corporation, or association shall sell, or offer for sale or for subscription, any issue, or any part of any issue, of securities hereafter issued, the par or face value of which issue shall be in excess of $100,000, except in accordance with such rules and regulations as such committee, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prescribe, nor, when required by such rules and regulations, except as permitted by licenses granted by such committee.

I am not going to read all of that section, but I want to call your attention to one more provision in this remarkable bill before I proceed to a somewhat general analysis of it in addition to the remarks I have already submitted.

Section 8 provides:

That whoever shall willfully violate any of the provisions of this act—

Well, that would be going very far, when you consider that this is an act for the regulation of civil business, but it it does not stop there:

That whoever shall willfully violate any of the provisions of this act or of any license, or of any rule or regulation issued and duly published hereunder, or whoever shall willfully violate, neglect, or refuse to comply with any such license or of any rule or regulation issued and duly published hereunder, shall, upon conviction in any court of the United States of competent jurisdiction, be fined not more than $1,000, or, if a natural person—

And you see here again the natural person is at least not discriminated against—imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

So that you propose, after clothing the Secretary of the Treasury with this remarkable and unprecedented power, absolutely without precedent or parallel in the annals of a free people, to provide not only that whoever violates any provision of the law itself shall be guilty of a felony and put in the penitentiary, but whoever violates any rule or regulation issued under the act; and not only that, you do not confine it to violations, but you say that whoever fails affirmatively to carry out any license or rule or regulation—and he may not know how to carry it out, or his judgment about carrying out the principle involved may differ from that of the committee or the Secretary—shall be punished as a common criminal.

Mr. President, if that is not the very limit to which what I might call legislative tyranny can go, I am totally in error. Not only do we provide that people who violate the law—a civil law, a business regulation—shall go to the penitentiary, but we provide that people who violate, either positively or negatively, any of the rules or regulations of this corporation shall go to the penitentiary.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. OWEN. I think it worth while to call the Senator's attention to the fact that such a committee as the Capital Issues Committee was a voluntary organization in England, and it functioned perfectly without any drastic imprisonment accompanying it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I thank the Senator for that. I have just made that statement; and in all other countries, as far as I am advised, or so far as my limited investigations of this subject have permitted me to go, the same thing is true. This is the first country—America, free America!—where any such provision as this, or where any such law as this, has been solemnly and deliberately offered to a lawmaking body.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is perhaps proper that I should say, being a member of the committee, that some of us were very much opposed to this provision, believing that if we went into this matter at all it ought to be left to a voluntary organization, as it is in other countries.

Mr. HARDWICK. I thank the Senator for that contribution, for that defense of the liberties of the country; and I think the Senate ought to rise up and rebel against any such business as this. What are we here for? Simply to carry out orders? There is not one of us who has studied this question who does not know that by amending the banking laws and by appealing to the patriotism of our business men and of our banks, after we give the banks the tools to work with, we can accomplish every purpose sought to be accomplished by this bill that ought to be accomplished.

If so, why enact this legislation? If so, why lie down in the face of our lifelong principles to the contrary, when we know that there is no necessity for it, when we know that this Federal banking system with some very slight amendments, supplemented by the voluntary and patriotic spirit of the banking and business institutions of this country, will be just as sufficient in this country as they have been in England or anywhere else?

Why do it? Why, my colleagues on this side, let me invite your attention to the fact that for years we have reproached our opponents who sit on the other side of the Chamber with the charge that under their administration of the Government the links were too close between big business and the Government.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to my friend from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have not heard all that the Senator has said; but I was wondering if he was aware of the fact also that there is already in existence in the United States a voluntary board, composed of members of the Federal Reserve Board and others, who are attempting to regulate this matter, and who, according to the testimony, have never had one of their recommendations violated?

Mr. HARDWICK. I thank the Senator for that contribution. The Secretary of the Treasury states it very well in his statement to the Senate committee, which is incorporated in the report. The Government would lose nothing. There would not be the slightest trouble whatever about getting the recommendation carried out under which the Secretary would adopt what he says: "We ought not to depend upon voluntary action in matters of this sort."

Ah, my colleagues, as I said a moment ago, we have charged the other side repeatedly, in campaign after campaign, with establishing and maintaining too close a connection of Government with big business, and we have demanded, all of us from our peerless leader on down, in campaign after campaign, in thunder tones, that Government and big business be divorced. Yet we are called on here to-day to help remarry them after we claimed that they were finally divorced. I say they ought to be divorced, and not temporarily divorced but permanently divorced. Yet if this law is enacted you have every business man in this country who has what even may be termed a middling business at the mercy of these officials established by this law. If he wants to borrow money, no matter how meritorious his enterprise, he can not get it unless they so wish. If he wants to issue stock and bonds and sell them to the investing public, he can not even offer them unless they consent.

Now, I ask you in all candor, in all fairness, is that right, or ought any administration or any party or any Government be subjected to a temptation of that character or left in a situation of that kind? I say not. I have protested against it in the past when I felt like too much of it was being quietly and clandestinely done when a party other than my own was in power. I thought it was wrong then and I think it is wrong now. We had better keep big business divorced from the Government. Of course, it is better, I reckon, that the Government should run big business interests than that big business interests should run the Government, but neither one of them presents a situation which appeals to me or that is best for the country.

Politics? Yes; as long as human nature remains unaltered, I do not care what party is in power or who is President of the country or who is Secretary of the Treasury, and I make no exception from the general character of this statement, there is danger, grave danger, that power of this sort will be abused, and that it may lead to awful trouble in this country. It is a power that ought not to exist in a free country and among a free people anywhere. There is nowhere where it can be safely lodged. It ought to be lodged, therefore, nowhere.

Now, in the first place, I say that the situation in my judgment, and I have tried to consider this question with all the intelligence I am capable of, is not such as to justify the method in which this bill is being rushed to what its friends hope is an early and easy passage.

Although the Government is demanding and will demand vast amounts of money for its loans in order to prosecute the war, that money is not therefore destroyed, carried out of circulation, burned up, but it is circulating around in the country and coming into other hands, and will be available in a circular and continuous process from whatever hands it is in, and will be ready to help all these enterprises month in and month out, year in and year out. But we need, according to the word of the Secretary of the Treasury, some changes in this banking law, some liberalizing of the kind and character of securities these banks will accept for loans, and that is what we ought to do. Give them just that, instead of creating one more gigantic corporation to put a whole lot of unnecessary power into somebody's hands. My judgment is that when the bill came to the Senate, if the Senate had such a committee, it ought to have been referred to the Committee on Election of President and Vice President instead of the Finance Committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was much interested in the legislation that created the Federal Reserve System, and I recall the roseate pictures that were presented to us as to the great results that would follow the establishment of that system. I knew, of course, it was based largely upon the Aldrich-Vreeland recommendations when the Republicans were in power, and I have noticed that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], who took great interest in that legislation, has offered a good many amendments to that statute which have been agreed to by the Senate, and I believe the Senator has some amendments pending.

Mr. GRONNA. There are about a dozen amendments pending.

Mr. GALLINGER. There are about a dozen amendments pending, I am told. I am going to venture in the time of the Senator from Georgia to ask the Senator from Oklahoma whether or not he thinks that that statute could be so amended as to accomplish substantially the same results that are aimed at in the bill now under consideration, if the Senator from Georgia will permit the interruption.

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from New Hampshire, by the courtesy of the Senator from Georgia, I will say that the Federal reserve act in its essential principles was based upon the German statute which permits quick currency against commercial bills under a penalty. The German statute itself grew out of the English instance of 1866, where the Bank of England was authorized by ministerial permit to make legal-tender money with the printing press in order to stop a panic, which it did stop in 24 hours.

Now, the Federal reserve act has had the effect, as it had the intention, of gathering together all the reserves held by the various member banks into a common fund of gold or its equivalent, which should be a constantly available safeguard, first, to the depositors of the member banks, and second, should be available for the purpose of quickly expanding the currency in the case of our industrial life requiring it. In any ordinary time that system would fully meet the exigencies of the case now. It will meet the exigencies of the case now as to all current commercial requirements. The difficulty we are faced with is that there are falling due many very large bond issues, and to refinance those bond issues when the Government is calling for all the available credit has proven difficult, if not in some cases impossible. The purpose and effect of this bill is to put the Government of the United States behind those institutions to which, because of the Government demand in seeking all available credit in the market, there is not left available for the maturing issues of bonds a proper market. I think the bill is justified on that ground.

There are some features in the bill which I have adverted to which I think could be improved, and ought to be improved, and I agree with the Senator from Georgia that the drastic imprisonment provision for disregarding a rule or regulation or a license is highly inexpedient. It is contrary to a proper administration of the government of a free people. I do not think it ought to be in the bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now, Mr. President, I want to conclude in a very few moments what I have to say about this bill, because I am afraid if I should go much further I might fully express my real opinion of it and tell the Senate how very much opposed to it I am.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator further permit me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield further to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. The question I propounded to the Senator from Oklahoma was not answered in the direct way that I think it ought to have been answered. It may be said after this bill becomes a law, if it does, that there was a better method and we could have reached the same result through an amendment of the Federal reserve act. That is the question I asked the Senator, because I know he is an expert and has given great study to that system, whether or not in his judgment we could meet the emergencies that now exist by an amendment of the Federal reserve act. I advance no opinion of my own, but I ask him whether we could meet the emergencies that now exist by an amendment to the Federal reserve act?

Mr. OWEN. I should go so far as to say that from the information which I have, I believe we might possibly do it, but I think it is inexpedient to subject the business of the country to the serious hazard in case available funds were not found to renew the bond issues which we know are maturing.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator's opinion I can quote the Secretary of the Treasury to the contrary. I called the attention of the Senate to it a few moments ago. The Secretary, in answer to the precise question, put in another way, as that propounded by the Senator from New Hampshire, said this:

> In Europe central banks are permitted to grant to banks and bankers loans upon stocks and bonds upon certain well-defined terms. The Federal reserve act does not provide for these, and the War Finance Corporation is designed as a war emergency to fill this gap.

That answers it. All you have got to do is to change the Federal reserve act so as to provide for the very thing that the Secretary of the Treasury recommends and, according to his own words, you have the purpose accomplished.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to the fact that the Federal reserve banks have no power to loan to member banks or issue notes upon anything except commercial paper and bonds of the United States.

The governor of that bank appeared before the committee, and after giving his approval to this measure discussed the limitation imposed upon Federal reserve banks. He said the purpose of it was to secure quick credits, to keep the funds of the bank liquid. He announced that the fundamental principle of the Federal reserve bank was that its funds should be liquid, and in order to carry out that fundamental principle their note-issuing powers, their lending powers, were limited to commercial paper running not more than 90 days and United States bonds.

Now, if you give them permission to loan or to issue notes upon long-time security, such security and only such security as these corporations whose maturities have been referred to here are able to give; in other words, if you remove the limitation which now exists and which was put there for the specific purpose of making the funds of this concern liquid at all times and extend their powers of loaning and of issuing notes to long-term paper, you will destroy—and that was the point made by the governor of the bank when he appeared before the committee—you will destroy the very foundation principles of the reserve bank system. Now, I ask the Senator from Oklahoma if that is not true?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, it, of course, is the principle of the reserve banking system that the reserves should be kept liquid. There was a very important concession made in the reserve act that loans might be made by the reserve bank with Government bonds as a security, because it was assumed that the Government bonds were always easily marketable.

Mr. SIMMONS. And liquid.

Mr. OWEN. And would serve the function of a liquid paper, although it was an investment. It differs in that respect from other forms of investment in having a larger and more readily available market.

Of course, this particular bill has provided that the bonds of this corporation should be given a like function, and that I confess I regret, because the only extent to which the Government really underwrites these bonds is to the extent of the loan of $500,000,000 of ready capital out of the Treasury in the first instance.

Mr. SIMMONS. That makes it for the purposes of the bank payable in Government bonds.

Mr. OWEN. These bonds might not prove to be as liquid as the Government bonds, although I should hope so, and would really expect so.

Mr. SIMMONS. But the point I wish to impress upon the Senator from Oklahoma is this: I assume that in limiting the powers of these banks as loaning institutions and note institutions to commercial paper and Government bonds, the thought was not that it was necessary that their assets should be liquid.

Mr. OWEN. That is, of course, true.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, if you permit them to loan upon all the long-term securities of the country without discrimination and to issue notes upon the long-term securities of the country just as you do upon commercial paper and Government bonds, will you not destroy that fundamental principle of the Federal reserve bank?

Mr. OWEN. The Federal reserve act expressly provides against loans upon investment securities for that reason, because investment securities are not always readily marketable.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if I may now be permitted to conclude, I just want to suggest to the Senator from Oklahoma that there are more ways to kill a dog besides choking him to death on butter, and what is the difference with these banks if they take these same securities and pass them through a Government-owned corporation and make them the basis of Federal reserve loans.

Mr. SIMMONS. You do not make the notes the security basis.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, yes; you do.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; the Senator is entirely mistaken. Not a single solitary security of any corporation, firm, association, or individual can be taken under this bill to the Federal reserve bank and money borrowed upon it or a note issued upon it.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not mean that not a single one of them can be taken to the banks and discounted or notes issued against them. If they reach the bank at all under the present banking law or under this bill they have got to be presented by a member bank. There is a provision allowing certain corporations to go directly to the Finance Corporation and secure advances, but the bonds which are issued to raise the money to make those advances have got to come to the Federal reserve bank through the intervention of a member bank.

Mr. HARDWICK. I did not dispute that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Therefore, if the Senator will pardon me, it is true that we have in no way interfered with or disturbed the present Federal banking system except to make a certain class of bonds, to wit, those of the Finance Corporation, available or eligible for advances.

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly, but the exception is the kernel of the whole matter. Undoubtedly you have not disturbed the Federal bank reserve system except in providing that the bonds of these industrial corporations that go through your Government corporation and then through the Federal reserve in most instances into a member bank shall be received at the Federal reserve bank as a basis for loans and as a basis for this currency.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. Just one moment, if the Senator will let me finish the sentence, and then I will yield. It is the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee. You do not change the proposition one iota, because you create a Government corporation, and say that the reserve shall go through it, but when they go through it they go through the member bank and finally into the Federal Reserve System and shall be there accepted as a basis of loans by the Federal reserve banks. In other words, you enlarge the volume of securities and you change the character of security upon which the Federal reserve banks may make loans. Now, you have done it indirectly through the intervention of this highly unnecessary corporation. If you are going to do it indirectly through the intervention of this corporation, why could you not do it directly by changing the law? That is the question that I have asked throughout my remarks, and that is the question to which my mind has been directing itself throughout my consideration of this entire bill, and the questions revolving about it and that are represented in it. Now, I yield to my friend from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is asking a question that has troubled me ever since I have given any consideration to this bill, and since it has been under debate. He has practically answered the question I wanted to ask. In answer to the question of the Senator from New Hampshire, why we could not have amended the Federal reserve act and avoided this intermediary corporation, the answer is made by the Senator from Oklahoma, that the Federal reserve bank wants to be liquid, and consequently can not handle these bonds. As I understand the pending bill, it would not have much if any virtue left in it if there was not an indirect way by which the bonds of this corporation will eventually get into the Federal reserve bank and currency be issued on them.

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly; which is an indirect way instead of doing it directly.

Mr. NORRIS. Instead of doing directly the thing which they say is going to be done without injury to the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. HARDWICK. They say you can not do it directly, because you impair the liquidity of the Federal Reserve System, but you can do it indirectly through this governmental system and not impair the liquid character of the Federal reserve securities. I say it is utterly absurd, with all respect to the gentlemen who make the contention.

Mr. NORRIS. What is the advantage of the $4,000,000,000 of bonds that this corporation is authorized to issue unless eventually those $4,000,000,000 of bonds, or whatever amount may be issued, will reach the Federal reserve banks and Federal reserve notes be issued for them?

Mr. HARDWICK. That is the purpose of it. There can be no question about it.

Now, Mr. President, I want to conclude. I have said really more than I intended to say about the bill, and, as I said just now, I am afraid if I keep on I will express, before I get through, my real sentiments about it. I am utterly opposed to it. It is wholly unnecessary. No man can bludgeon me into supporting a proposition like that on the ground and for the reason that it is necessary to do it in order to win the war. My mind revolts as a matter of common sense against any such contention as that. If we are going to comply with somebody else's views about what is the best way to do this, it may be necessary to create another governmental corporation, with more employees, with more power; and it may be necessary for the Government to dip its fingers still further in the conduct and control of business from another and different angle; it may be necessary for people who want to build up on every line and from every angle autocratic administrative powers; but from my standpoint, opposed as I am to that movement and believing as I do that the time has come and has been here for some time when it ought to be checked, to some extent at least, it is utterly impossible for me to accept any such contention as that or to support any such measure. I do not think that even John Law, the canny Scotchman who once dazzled and bamboozled France, ever dreamed of a scheme quite so Utopian and quite so full of financial possibilities as this measure is, and my own idea is that it could have been born in no other brain except the fertile brain of a trained Wall Street promoter.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think the matter pending before the Senate is the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the pending question.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have conferred with some members of the Finance Committee, and after a conference with them, and especially with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who had somewhat vigorously opposed the amendment, I am authorized on behalf of the committee to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HARDING. Let the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, in the committee amendment, line 19, before the word "firm," the first word in the line, insert the word "person" and a comma, so as to read "to any person, firm, corporation, or association."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the amendment is disposed of I want to say that, as a very humble member of the Committee on Finance, it never occurred to me that the committee was legislating for the capitalists of the country as against the common people of the country, nor do I think that the exclusion of the word "persons" would bear out a charge of that kind.

There is a great deal in this bill which is designed to benefit the people of small means in the United States. I called attention the other day to the fact that there are almost $5,000,000,000 of money deposited in the mutual savings banks of this country, and that there are in those banks about 9,000,000 depositors. I called attention also to the fact that in all the savings institutions of the country, mutual and otherwise, there are over $16,000,000,000 of money; and if the same proportion exists as to depositors there are 36,000,000 individual depositors, all of whom it was designed should be benefited by the passage of this bill; and they will be benefited to an extent that is very desirable.

Mr. President, that is an important consideration, showing that the committee were mindful of the interests of the people of small means in the United States. These 36,000,000 depositors, if there are that many—and, mathematically considered, there must be nearly that many—have deposited between $400 and $500 each in the savings banks; and they are taken care of.

As a member of the committee I did not notice particularly that the word "persons" was stricken from the bill; but I assume that it was done upon the assumption that, as there are, outside of these 36,000,000 depositors, about 75,000,000 other persons in the country, if it were left open for every citizen to make a raid upon this corporation there would be a great deal of disappointment; that it would be utterly impossible for the corporation to yield to the demands; and I can see no reason for keeping the word out. I do not think it will do much harm one way or the other, and I have great faith that if this bill becomes a law, in whatever form it may ultimately assume, the men who are at the head of this corporation will have sense enough to use wise discrimination, and that they will not expend the money of the Government, which must ultimately come from the pockets of the taxpayers, in aiding unworthy persons who perhaps are wanting to secure money for speculative or other purposes of that kind. So I am rather glad that the chairman of the committee, after consultation with some members of the committee, has concluded that it is wise to accept the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. HOLLIS].

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the Federal Reserve System, in my opinion, is performing a tremendously useful function to the country. I will say that gladly, because I did not vote for the law, and yet I believe it has really been of tremendous use to the country, especially in this crisis. I think if I were to denominate the most important law as a matter of national defense which has been passed by Congress in several years, I would have to place the Federal reserve law first.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. As I recall the matter, the Senator from Michigan was very warmly and earnestly in favor of the so-called Aldrich-Vreeland Act, which really was the basis for the Federal reserve act.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I thank the Senator from New Hampshire, who recalls our efforts to set the national financial house in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I shall yield in just a moment. If Senators will recall, I had something to do with stripping the emergency currency act of one of its great weaknesses, which was the provision allowing the Secretary of the Treasury to take certain bonds of railroads and to capitalize them into liquid money. I made a fight on this floor against this unwise discrimination; and if that provision disappeared from the bill, I will take my share of responsibility for it. But—and I will yield in just a moment—we have 12 Federal reserve banks, every one of them competently managed. We are now proposing to take away from those 12 banks the judgment and the experience and the sound sense which has given to that system an excellent reputation, and we are forcing obligors under certain contracts throughout the country to go to one source for money. I heard—I think I heard, but I will take it back if I am wrong—I think I heard the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] say many times while we were discussing the Vreeland-Aldrich bill that his criticism of the measure was due to the evident purpose of the act to monopolize credits and control, through a single bank, the money market. Am I wrong? The Senator from Oklahoma did not favor one central bank; and yet this proposed legislation centralizes more power in a gigantic financial corporation than could be found in the centralized national bank that Mr. Aldrich and Mr. Vreeland advocated. Yes, many times more; and yet do we look upon it with equanimity.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. I rose to correct what I thought was an error in the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] that the Federal reserve act was based on the Vreeland-Aldrich Act. The Vreeland-Aldrich Act had one merit; it did provide for a quick expansion of currency against assets. Its objections were pointed out by me in 1908 on this floor in a three-hours' discussion of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I recall the Senator's attitude.

Mr. OWEN. But the beginning of that element in American history, so far as I know, was in a measure which I myself drew in 1900, and which was presented on the floor of the Senate by James K. Jones—a record of which I put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in 1908. The merit of the Vreeland-Aldrich Act was that it adopted that principle, a principle, however, which comes really from the Imperial German Bank, which, as a matter of statute, permits the issuance of quick money against assets under penalty.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Why, Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma and no other Senator on this floor could compare the proposed Vreeland-Aldrich Act in its power of monopoly in monetary affairs with the power which is proposed to be conferred by this bill.

Why do we not amend the Federal reserve act? It could be easily amended. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] talks about that act dealing with liquid assets. Of course it deals with liquid assets. Congress can, however, enlarge its scope and broaden its field of usefulness to meet present necessities. Why do you propose to force these people to come to the Secretary of the Treasury and to four other men? Is it to give the Secretary of the Treasury supervisory power over the industrial and commercial affairs of our country? And he has unlimited power in this bill. I am not criticizing the present Secretary of the Treasury; I would speak of any other Secretary of the Treasury in similar vein. I am talking of the office. The unblushing truth about the matter is that it is desired to concentrate this tremendous power in that office.

I would prefer to spread the power out among the 12 Federal reserve banks of the country, the regulation for the conduct of whose business is made by this board sitting in Washington. Yes, as the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] says, the original bill shows that the Secretary of the Treasury wanted this vast power, for in the bill, as it came down from the Treasury Department, it contained vastly more power of control over business men than it does now and provided for giving a regulatory veto upon the enterprise and the initiative of citizens by saying that they can do no business until they have obtained the permission of the Secretary of the Treasury, which is such a restraint upon business as I believe will have a most unfavorable and unfortunate effect upon the country.

Mr. President, I want to go along and do the appropriate thing to maintain the national solidarity, to help in every possible way to maintain the national credit; but, really, I think that this is a tremendous and far-reaching power. I think it could, with great propriety, be left to the men who are now engaged in sifting from among the assets of borrowers the good from the bad, bringing experience and sound judgment to the task; and yet, while I did not rise to address myself at any length to this provision, I favor amending the Federal reserve act for this purpose and delegating the authority to extend these credits to the regularly organized Federal reserve banks.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I will say that that is a mere phase of it; that is not the fundamental question here at all.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is the fundamental question.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is not the fundamental question. The fundamental question is, Where are you going to get the money to loan to these institutions?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am frank to say to the Senator from North Carolina that I do not know.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not know; it must be found by some one to avoid ruin.

Mr. SIMMONS. It has got to be found in this way.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It has got to be found somewhere, that is certain.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Government has either got to loan these people money directly out of the Treasury or it must establish a corporation of this character for the purpose of performing a function which it would be inconvenient for the Treasury to perform.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I differ with the Senator as to detail.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, of course the Government can get the money into the Treasury by taxation or by selling its bonds, and loan it to these people directly; but I do not believe anybody would think it desirable for the Government to make loans to the private industries in this country. The purpose of this act is largely to set up an institution which can act for the Government, without requiring it, through the Treasury, to act as a securities broker.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well——

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, if the Senator will pardon me, in order to carry out that theory we start this corporation by appropriating $500,000,000 out of the Treasury and putting it into the hands of this corporation. This act authorizes the corporation to issue and sell its bonds for the purpose of getting money to supplement the $500,000,000 and as additional funds are needed.

We have argued, and it is true, that just at this time the banks are discriminating against the character of security these essential war industries and corporations are able to offer, and in favor of commercial institutions not doing war work but whose securities are of a more liquid character.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. On short-time paper.

Mr. SIMMONS. On short-time paper. Now, the banks can get credit on this from the reserve banks, on the commercial paper, but not on the long-time paper of these industries.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But they can get it.

Mr. SIMMONS. They can get credits and funds to buy liberty bonds and to carry on the ordinary commercial business of the country, and this bill provides a way for them to get credits on long-term paper also.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But they can get the money, and they can get it from the Federal reserve bank if the act is amended.

Mr. SIMMONS. No.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If we will authorize the Federal reserve banks to loan to member banks upon this kind of security, they can get the money, and the loans will be supervised by men of skill and experience in 12 different geographical subdivisions of the country. No bank would like to borrow for 90 days on a long-time unliquid security.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let us see if they can. Suppose you do that, if the Federal Reserve Board should authorize the Federal reserve banks to issue up to the limit, to issue as much money as they may issue under the present law under the gold-reserve limitation, does the Senator think the amount would be sufficient to meet the demand? Besides a bank would hardly think it safe to give it 90-day obligation secured by long-term unliquid securities.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think that is where you are ultimately going to land.

Mr. SIMMONS. No.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think you are going to land in the present national banking system in spite of yourselves if you get any liquid money with which to do business. I do not know where else you can go.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not able to say just at this moment exactly what amount of note issues the gold reserve would cover. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] knows that the Federal reserve bank has no authority to issue notes against any kind of paper unless that paper is covered by 40 per cent of gold. Is not that true?

Mr. OWEN. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, my understanding is that there is not enough gold in the Federal reserve banks to allow of the issue of probably more than a billion and a quarter dollars of notes by the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If that is so, we are approaching a period of the wildest kind of inflation.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator says that these industries can take their paper to the Federal reserve bank and get the money. This paper will amount probably to $4,000,000,000 or $5,000,000,000. They will have to have that amount; and the Senator says they can take these notes, amounting to $5,000,000,000, and go to the Federal reserve bank and get the money. I say they could not do it if the act were so amended as to allow it, not only because of the limitation as to the gold reserve but because of the unliquid character of the securities. But suppose the Senator is right, suppose the gold reserve is sufficient to float four and a half billions of dollars, reserve-bank notes, and that that amount of currency should be issued on these securities, does not the Senator think that would be dangerous inflation of the currency?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do; and I would be very sorry to see it done; but I am not going to run so far away from the question of issuing asset currency against good bills for short time as to bring about any such situation as the Senator describes. I think we are straining the gold reserve tremendously under the plan we are now pursuing, and I think this bill will strain it further. We will be obliged to resort to some form of monetary expansion, but I do not want that done on the ipse dixit of the Secretary of the Treasury and one or two other men. I would rather have the sifting process performed by the regularly established Federal banking system of the country.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me ask the Senator this question: Is it not true that the banks of the country at this time are in a condition that makes it impossible for them to adequately finance the business of this country?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think the banks have gotten along very well with it thus far.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does not the Senator know——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Wait a moment. I think they have gotten along very well with it thus far. I think perhaps, unless the Government finds it necessary to put out a form of security drawing a larger rate of interest than banks now pay for deposits, that they may be able to hold their deposits and meet the ordinary, indeed the extraordinary, demands upon them for money; but why put this added weight upon the bent shoulders of the Secretary of the Treasury. I am willing that they should make the regulations; I am perfectly willing that this board should make any regulations necessary, but I should like to have the sifting process go on through the regular banking channels and not become the object of the personal desire and favoritism of any political officer of the Government. The country must not lose faith in the Treasury Department; why tempt it into these untried fields, the end of which no man can foresee? I think the Secretary is doing his best, the problems are new and vexatious, why should we not distribute this responsibility and thus quicken public confidence?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly; I am through.

Mr. OWEN. I think it quite important, in considering the matter which the Senator has been discussing, to determine what is the volume of the maturing obligations. I do not really know; but I understand it is about seven hundred million or eight hundred million dollars altogether.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I think it is about $1,000,000,000, though I am not quite sure.

Mr. OWEN. What is the authority for that statement?

Mr. SIMMONS. The testimony before the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That does not include railroad bonds.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think it includes railroad bonds.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It includes only public-utility and public-service bonds. If you add the railroad bonds maturing, you will get several billion dollars.

Mr. SMOOT, Mr. SIMMONS, and Mr. WATSON. Oh, no!

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, I am talking about the full scope of this act, which includes munition plants, copartnerships, and individual obligations the country over, coming within the broad scope of this bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. The railroad bonds will add two or three hundred million dollars more.

Mr. SMOOT. They will add much more than that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma, because he rose first.

Mr. OWEN. I was merely making the inquiry with regard to the actual amount which would be required, because the bill provides for eight times as many bonds as the original amount of the capital, which would make a total of $4,500,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. The testimony shows——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. The testimony shows that the maturing bonds of all railroads, public-utility corporations, and institutions known to issue bonds regularly for their going business amount to two billion five hundred and odd million dollars.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Coming due when?

Mr. SMOOT. Within the next two years.

Mr. OWEN. I think, however, that institutions in the regular business of issuing bonds for their going business ought to be cut out of this.

Mr. SMOOT. It is well enough to say that they ought to be cut out of this, but they would not have been cut out if the Government had not monopolized the money market. They must have credit in order to refinance those bonds, and they can not get the money to do so.

Mr. OWEN. It was not refinancing the Senator referred to.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes.

Mr. OWEN. Oh, no; I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I referred to.

Mr. OWEN. I beg the Senator's pardon. The point I was making was that those institutions that were merely issuing bonds for the expansion of their business ought not to be included in this.

Mr. SMOOT. I had no reference to new issues at all; I had reference to bonds that were already issued and that would mature in the next two years.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Now, the Senator is taking public-utility and public-service corporation bonds.

Mr. SMOOT. And railroad bonds.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But he has not taken the obligations of any firm, corporation, or association conducting an established and going business whose operations are necessary to the prosecution of the war. It will be necessary to add the amount they require to this tremendous sum; and I want to tell you, Senators, that rather than place that power in the hands of two or three individuals, who may exercise their personal whim and favoritism, I would prefer to have this whole question sifted in 12 Federal reserve banks scattered throughout the country, who have the power and the capacity and the organization to pass upon these questions. Why do we ignore them in an important matter like this, when we have sought to concentrate our entire monetary strength in the Federal Reserve System? I do not know why it is done. Do other Senators? There is the possibility of the most intense favoritism under this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. Warburg, of the Federal Reserve Board, testifying as to the obligations that would fall due for the year 1918, made this statement:

> Mr. WARBURG. The total of maturities for this year amounts to $799,000,000.
> Senator GORE. That is, in the year 1918?
> Mr. WARBURG. Yes, sir; in the year 1918. Of that, $214,000,000 are railroad, $224,000,000 are public utilities, $182,000,000 are industrials, $120,000,000 are State, county, and municipals, and $58,000,000 are companies in Canada, Cuba, and Mexico, a total of about $800,000,000.

Then, on the following page, he states the months in which the amounts will fall due and the amounts which will fall due each month. Then, in another exhibit that was presented to the committee, he made this statement:

> The best available figures showing the totals of financial issues in the United States exclusive of foreign loans, for the four years prior to America's entry into the war, are as follows:
> Corporate financing, $1,864,000,000; State, county, and municipal financing, $696,800,000; or a grand total, on the par value of 1916, of $2,560,800,000.

Mr. OWEN. That is just of financial issues, of course?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. OWEN. But I am astonished to see that the total amount of these maturities during the year 1918 is only $800,000,000, while this bill provides for $4,500,000,000. What is the explanation of that?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The bill authorizes the issuance of bonds to the extent of eight times the capital stock of the corporation, or $4,000,000,000; would it not be better to send this whole matter to the reserve banks?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, Mr. President, there has to be, and is going on to-day, a great expansion of the industries of the United States. Congress has already passed a law authorizing the War Department and the Navy Department to advance one-third of the contract price for the manufacture of munitions of war and war material.

Mr. OWEN. That is, in addition to this.

Mr. SMOOT. In addition to this.

Mr. OWEN. How much is that?

Mr. SMOOT. No one can tell, Mr. President.

Mr. OWEN. I thought the Senator knew.

Mr. SMOOT. No; no one can tell, because there has been no report made yet.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It runs into many billions; I said a few minutes ago several billions. I think it is somewhere near right. I know it will run into large figures very fast.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the object that the Secretary of the Treasury has in advocating the passage of this bill is to do away with all of these advances to contractors, and that all of the institutions of the United States that have to be assisted in the way of expansion to provide the necessary requirements of the Government for war materials of any kind shall receive assistance through this corporation.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I am not going to continue to occupy the floor because I do not feel that I ought to; but I will repeat, in a way, what I said when I rose—that this power to make advances directly does not appeal to me at all. I think there is great danger in it. There is great chance of favoritism in it. There is too much power over private business in it, in my judgment, to be rested in any single tribunal. I should much prefer to see the entire situation met in another way, and that by amendment of the Federal reserve bank act, which, I think, could be done in one day's time here if the personal ambitions of men could be subtracted from this situation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator has voiced a very fine eulogy upon the management of the Federal reserve banks. Two of the directors of the Federal reserve banks came before the Committee on Finance, and both of them testified to the necessity of a law of this character. Both of them regarded the subject as too great to be handled by the Federal reserve banks under the present condition.

A great deal has been said about giving the Federal reserve banks the power to issue their money, and so forth, upon these ordinary long-time credits and to loan money upon them. The Senator knows that the experience of the banking business for 200 years has demonstrated the danger of long-time securities. The Government can carry those securities. The bank, if there is a run on it, can not reach its hands into the pockets of the people and get their money. The Government can. The bank must depend upon paper which it can liquidate in a very few days, something that will quickly become due. The Government does not have to do that, because it can, by tax law, say to the people, "You must give us that amount of money," and it will take it from them. You can not make a run upon the Government; you can upon a bank.

The point that I want to make is this: In the present condition of the money market, in view of the fact that the Government has preempted that market for every possible dollar that can be obtained for the purpose of selling its bonds, it was thought absolutely necessary by the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the advice of the very men that the Senator is extolling—the members of the board of directors of the Federal reserve bank—that some such measure as this should be enacted.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will answer the Senator. In the first place, I was not referring to the general board of the Federal reserve bank at all. They make rules and regulations, but their function is generally a supervisory one. I was talking about the units composing the system, men of banking experience and experienced in credits, who are thereby enabled to pass upon the securities and paper offered for discount. I have nothing to say in criticism about the general board; they are honorable, able men; but I would very much prefer to leave these discounts to the Federal reserve banks.

With reference to long-time paper, the Senator knows that under our State banking laws about one-half, I think, of the deposits of State banks are invested in long-time securities; and we are obliged to do it under the law.

Mr. McCUMBER. The national law extended it so that they could take, I think, 25 per cent.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The national law has been changed; but in the States we loan upon real-estate mortgages practically, and they run for a long time. The longer they run the better they are, if the security in the first instance is good; so that the liquid character of that form of assets can not be questioned.

Now, I want some relief for these people. I am as anxious for it as anyone else. I want to maintain our monetary structure in all its strength and security, but I do not want to open the door to special favoritism. I do not want to leave in two or three hands the discretionary power to loan $4,500,000,000. I dislike to leave that in the hands of two or three people, and I think the same result could be accomplished in a better way.

Mr. McCUMBER. I agree with the Senator, if he will allow me. None of us would wish to vote for a bill of this kind. We have had to put very many measures through the Senate and the House which we never would have put through except under a most urgent condition, where we have had to centralize power. I certainly would not vote for a bill of this kind if I did not think it was necessary; and, while it does not in all respects conform to my own views, I believe that in the present financial condition, with the necessity for not only raising enormous sums of money by taxation but in addition to that raising billions upon billions by the sale of bonds, we have so monopolized the market that there will need to be something to steady that market and to hold up the credit of the country in such a way that we will be able to sell at par our long-term bonds bearing a low rate of interest.

Now, I would not be governed by my own judgment. I am governed by the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, which is supported by that of practically all of the financial men in the country, and especially those in charge of the great Federal reserve banks. I believe it is necessary.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota is one of the soundest men in this Chamber, and has a reason for everything he does, and I respect him very highly. I have gone along with him in meeting this extraordinary crisis in the country's affairs in a liberal and a broad and, I was almost going to say, a reckless way. But when we come up to a situation like this, dealing with the money of the country and its credit, I must say that I approach with a great deal of trepidation a proposition with such possibilities in it as there seem to be in this measure. This corporation may loan eight times its capital—$4,500,000,000. When you go to that board and ask for money, what are they going to give you? They have got to give you something with which to pay your debts. They can not give you the morning Post or the Evening Star. They have got to give you money, and they have got to give you current money that will pass for taxes and for other obligations. Where are they going to get that money; where are they going to get it?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I answer that question?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. They will not, in all instances, have to give money.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then there will have to be a moratorium.

Mr. McCUMBER. The fact is that the only money they have to give is the $500,000,000 which we vote, and such sums as may be paid back again. That is all the money they have to spend. But, now, here is an institution. It has a certain character of paper—paper that it can not possibly take to the bank. It may be too long-term paper. It can not take it to even the Federal reserve bank and get currency on it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Or it may be for too large an amount.

Mr. McCUMBER. Now, just let me explain. What will the Treasury do? "If you need a million dollars and take a million dollars of these bonds, we will take those bonds in trade for your paper."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is, the corporation's bonds.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; the corporation's bonds. Then, the corporation's bonds can be taken by the institution to a Federal reserve bank, and the Federal reserve bank can issue currency thereon. In that way, and in that way only, can they get currency on the bonds.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. How much of this kind of obligation does the Senator think will be presented to the Federal reserve bank?

Mr. McCUMBER. Of course the limit would be $4,000,000,000; but in addition to that limit, as has already been explained by the chairman, there is another limit, that the issue altogether must be supported by 40 per cent in gold. Therefore, for each billion dollars that they can issue there would have to be in the Treasury of these banks $400,000,000 in gold, and if they issue the full extent of $4,000,000,000 they must have 40 per cent of that, or $1,600,000,000, in gold in the treasury of the Federal reserve banks.

Therefore I do not think it possible that there can be an inflation of $4,000,000,000 upon these bonds, because the entire amount of gold in the United States, I think, is only a little over a billion dollars now.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the Senator is in fairly good health and he has a new certificate of election. I prophesy that before very much time goes by Congress will change the present necessary gold reserve to a new basis, and you will change it before very long. We can not protect our monetary system from inflation and exercise the full powers provided in this bill. When once the door is open for big borrowers to get relief from the Federal Treasury there will be no limit to their desires, and each step will make it more difficult to stay their hand. I think we are courting trouble and that bad results will follow our action. Other and better methods should be employed to aid these people.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to:

Mr. GERRY obtained the floor.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Rhode Island will pardon me, there is one other amendment that I said I would offer if this was adopted, to the same effect.

At the beginning of the paragraph, where the word "corporation" occurs, I move to insert, before the word "corporation," the words "person, firm," and then, after the word "corporation," the words "or association."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 16, page 9, before the word "corporation," it is proposed to insert the words "person, firm," and, after the word "corporation," to insert the words "or association," so that, if amended, it will read: "to any person, firm, corporation, or association owning or controlling (directly or through stock ownership)."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is upon the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have an amendment to offer to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say to the Senator from Maine that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] has already been recognized, and yielded merely for the purpose of having this amendment agreed to. The Chair now recognizes the Senator from Rhode Island, and the Senator from Maine will be permitted to offer his amendment just a few moments later.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, when the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] was discussing this bill the other day he referred to the revenue bill which was passed last October, and objected because he said only one-third of the revenue was raised by taxation, and he did not think that was a sufficient amount.

In the New York Times of to-day there is an article on the first page which shows that the cost of running the war for the past three months has averaged about a billion dollars a month, and that one-third of that amount in January was the amount expended for our allies. I find upon investigation that during the past eight months of the fiscal year about $7,000,000,000 has been expended, and that three billion and something over three hundred million dollars of this amount was loaned to the allies. Therefore, I think it is safe to assume, as the Senator from New Hampshire did, that our total expenditures for the fiscal year ending in June will amount to $12,000,000,000. Out of that amount about one-third is money that will be loaned to our allies for their expenditures, making the amount paid by this Government for its own account about $8,000,000,000. If we raise $4,000,000,000 in taxation, as the Senator from New Hampshire suggests—and I think he is right on that; in fact, I think he is conservative; we will probably raise more than that—these figures clearly show that we shall obtain at least 50 per cent of our expenditures in this country from taxation alone. That is a greater amount derived from taxation than any other country has attempted in this war, and, in fact, a greater proportion than I believe has ever been raised by any country in any war.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has stated that he would recognize the junior Senator from Maine to offer an amendment.

Mr. HOLLIS. I understood that this question was addressed to me. I can answer it in two minutes, or give my idea of it. I do not desire to engage in any controversy, but merely to make a reply to the Senator.

The income of a Government is like the income of a person in that it depends upon what he is earning and what he can borrow.

The amount that he can borrow depends upon the amount that he is earning—that is, upon his income. A bank will loan a large amount of money to a man who is in business with but little capital if he can show that his earnings are high.

Now, it makes no difference in financing the war whether we raise money and spend it for the purposes of our own Army and Navy, or whether we raise it and loan it to other countries to spend for their purposes when they expend it in our country. Therefore, if we spend for both purposes $12,000,000,000 in this year and raise $4,000,000,000 in taxes, we are raising one-third of the total expenditure; and that that is not enough is shown by the fact that we can not borrow at a reasonable rate as much as is necessary to carry out our intentions in this war.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, he will admit that our allies will pay us back this $4,000,000,000 that they have borrowed from us.

Mr. HOLLIS. I do not admit it. I hope so; but we will get it back so late that it will not do us any good. If they could pay us back at once, they would not be borrowing from us. We are spending that money just as much as if we hired their armies and their navies and paid the bills. It is just as hard for us to get it; and when we need such a vast sum over and above what we get in our income, we have to pay more for it than we ought to pay.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator will admit, then, that we may have to pay more at the present time, but that that money will be paid back, and that what he really is recommending is that we should have a higher percentage raised by taxation than 50 per cent

Mr. HOLLIS. No; because when we loan it to our allies to spend it is exactly the same as if we spent it ourselves. I have a certain amount of money. It does not make any difference whether I spend it or give it to my family to spend; it will be spent, and I have to borrow more to take its place. It may be that at some time my son will be able to support me in my old age and pay it all back; but it is just as hard for me to borrow it now as if he never were going to.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator does not think that when we loan money which is to be repaid us in the future it is the same thing as giving it away?

Mr. HOLLIS. I hope we are not giving it away. We have given away several hundred millions to Russia. I hope we are not; but it will not do us any good as a quick asset when we get it back in 20 or 30 years.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in that connection I simply want to say that if we had placed a greater tax upon the industries of this country than we have already placed, we would simply have to advance more money through this bill, if it becomes a law, than we otherwise would. So, Mr. President, it only amounts to this—whether we shall make these loans to the institutions of this country, or whether we shall by direct taxes take money from the institutions of this country when it is absolutely impossible for them to run under present conditions with the tax already imposed.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, this is a fruitful topic for discussion. I will yield now to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the words proposed to be inserted by the committee, on page 10, at the end of line 7, the following words:

And provided further, That the corporation shall file quarterly reports with the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, giving the name and place of business of the firm, corporation, or association to which such advances have been made under the provisions of this subdivision, the amount advanced, the terms, and the security accepted therefor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator ought to put in the word "person," I think, as we have amended the bill.

Mr. HALE. Yes; the word "person" should be inserted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be modified so as to include the word "person."

The SECRETARY. So as to read: "That the person, firm, corporation, or association," and so forth.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not think it is necessary to make any explanation of this amendment, and unless some Senator desires to discuss it I shall not speak further upon it. The chairman of the committee, I understand, is willing to accept it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, on behalf of the committee I will accept that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, before we adjourn I want to put in just a brief statement by the governor of the Federal Reserve Board with reference to this bill. It is very brief, and I will read it.

Speaking of this particular bill, he says:

This particular bill has never been sent to the Federal Reserve Board for its consideration, and the board, therefore, has not taken any stand regarding it, either favorable or otherwise. The board, however, is interested in the objects which the bill seeks to attain, and is impressed with the importance of some measure of relief for the securities market.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, who was making that comment?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Harding, the governor of the board.

Mr. OWEN. That this bill was never sent to the Federal Reserve Board?

Mr. SIMMONS. He says that the Federal Reserve Board has never acted upon this bill.

Mr. OWEN. I see.

Mr. SIMMONS. He says:

Some time ago the board adopted a resolution putting itself on record that some governmental intervention was necessary in order to take care of this situation, and it threw out the same idea in its annual report to Congress, which was submitted about two weeks ago.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you mind giving us the benefit of your individual opinion as to the necessity for legislation of this sort?

Mr. HARDING. I think that legislation providing for Government aid is absolutely essential.

Mr. President, I do not think it is a question whether the banks can finance the situation, because I do not understand that anybody familiar with the financial situation of the country believes for a minute, even if the powers of the Federal reserve banks with reference to the discount of paper and issue of notes were broadened as far as can safely be done, that the banks would be in any position to take care of the present financial situation. I think the Senator from Michigan and others who have spoken this evening have entirely misunderstood the general purpose of this legislation. This legislation is based upon the theory that it is necessary for the Government to come to the relief of the money market of the country and to loan the money that is necessary to finance these institutions that can not secure relief through the banks. The question, therefore, is simply one whether the Government shall issue Government bonds, put them on the market and sell them, and thereby further contract the abilities of the banks and the general investment security market to meet the situation, or will the Government extend this necessary aid through the intervention of a corporation of which it is the sole stockholder, authorized to issue bonds, and put them upon the market and sell them for the purpose of getting money.

It is not intended that all these bonds shall be exchanged for securities. Nobody proposes that. There is lodged in this corporation the authority to sell its bonds upon the market—the bonds, it is true, of a corporation, but of a corporation of which the Government is the sole and exclusive stockholder. So the Government is not legally bound for those bonds like its bonds issued through the Treasury Department. It is morally bound, and that moral obligation in this case is as strong and good as the legal obligation. Through the sale of those bonds money can be secured to add to the $500,000,000; but if the corporation is not able to sell its bonds, if an institution comes asking for aid, then the corporation can say, "I can not furnish you the money; the money is not in the Treasury, but I will furnish you my bond."

I merely wished to make that statement.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator a question. He says, very properly, that these bonds are a moral obligation of the Government. I wish to ask him, that being true, and it being true that the Government would be obliged by that moral obligation to have these bonds in case anything should happen with regard to the security of a corporation of an untoward character, would it not be better simply to put in a guaranty of the bond by the Government in the first instance, so as to give them the highest market quality possible?

Mr SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not think the guaranty of the Government would add anything to the value of these bonds. If the Government is going to guarantee the bonds, it would be just about as well to lend them in the first instance.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator makes a distinction between a bond which is a moral obligation of the Government and a bond which is a legal obligation of the Government. If the Senator makes that distinction, then these bonds ought not to be used by the Federal reserve banks as a basis of issuing currency.

Mr. SIMMONS. I said that while that was a distinction it was practically a distinction without a substantial difference so far as the soundness of the obligation was concerned.

Mr. OWEN. There is a very substantial difference because, where the moral obligation exists it would necessarily lead to an appeal by the bondholders at some future time to the Government to make good any deficiency. But if the legal obligation exists in advance that matter is settled, and it will affect the market value of the securities. It would convert these bonds into what would be practically a quick asset, and there is always a good market for Government bonds at some reasonable figure.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not share the opinion of the Senator that the Government would attach any more importance to a bond that it was legally liable for than to a bond it was morally liable for.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator misunderstands my position.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am afraid I do.

Mr. OWEN. I am not speaking about the significance which the Government would attach; I am speaking of the significance which the purchaser in the open market would attach to a bond which would be a legal obligation of the Government and a bond which merely had a moral claim on the Government.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think there will be any trouble about these bonds of the corporation. There is the moral responsibility of the Government behind it, commanding a price in the market probably not as great but substantially as great as that of the bonds of the Government itself.

Mr. OWEN. I hope this matter will not take the attitude of being a mere difference of opinion between Senators on the floor, because this is a thing which will affect the Federal Reserve System in a serious way, and it ought not to be dealt with merely as a casual difference of opinion among Senators. It ought to be analyzed, and its consequences ought to be fully weighed before this legislation goes upon the statute books.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not agree with the Senator that it will affect the Federal Reserve System in any harmful way. I think, however, what some Senators have suggested here this evening, to wit, to amend the Federal Reserve System so as to make these long-term notes eligible for discount, would very seriously impair the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. OWEN. That is another question entirely from the one I was raising on this particular bill. These bonds are put upon a parity with Government bonds as a basis of loan by the Federal reserve bank, and when that is done in this bill and then afterwards it proves that the market does not attach to these bonds the same quality it attaches to other bonds, the Federal reserve banks might have their assets impaired.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not wish to prolong this colloquy. I think I understand the Senator's idea. His idea, as I understand him, is to have the Government guarantee these bonds. If the Senator desires to discuss that matter on Monday or when the bill is taken up again I shall be very glad to hear his views upon the subject. Now, merely upon the statement of the Senator, I do not think it would be advisable; but when the Senator elaborates his views about it and analyzes it, as I understand he intends to do, he may change my views about it.

Mr. OWEN. I realize the condition.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate take a recess——

Mr. GALLINGER. Before the Senator makes that motion, may I suggest that he ask that the bill be reprinted with the amendments that have already been agreed to, so that we can see what shape it is in?

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall be very glad to do so. At the suggestion of my colleague on the committee, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be reprinted as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

RECESS.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock on Monday.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, March 4, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 2, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. John Huddle, D. D., of St. Paul's English Lutheran Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Out of the wreckage of dismembered nations and blighted civilization, a war-weary world, O God, cries unto Thee. O Lord, hear our cry.

In the midst of smoke and blood make bare Thy mighty arm, and confuse the intelligence and paralyze the force of all antagonism to human rights, and give to men everywhere the prerogative to govern themselves according to their own desires and standards, unhindered by the subtle devices of a designing and selfish ambition.

We praise Thee for the purity of America's purpose, for the unselfishness of her motive. We covet no man's gold, no nation's territory. We are responding to humanity's appeal for government of the people, for the people, and by the people, and we plead, O God, for Thy directing wisdom and almighty power.

Bless the legislators and executives of our land in this gigantic undertaking. Strengthen the bodies and inspire the souls of the men in uniform, in the air, on the sea, and in the trench. Vouchsafe unto them the continuance of the splendid courage they have so far displayed, and hasten the time when they, with their brave allies, shall win for the world a righteous and permanent peace.

Bless the loved ones here who are in sorrow, and others to whom grief will come as the days go. Help their patriotism to rise as far as possible above personal attachment, and comfort them with the thought that "greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friend."

Bless all the tender ministries of grace and mercy that bind up the wounded, and fire the hearts of the discouraged with new faith and fortitude. Abide Thou, O God, in all the hospitals, camps, and battle fields of earth, and may men everywhere in this crucial hour find Thee not an empty name, but an all-satisfying reality, giving a peace and a power that pass all understanding.

O Thou Lamb of God that takest away the sins of the world, remove our sins, individual and national, as far as the east is from the west, so that naught may insulate us from the spiritual energies and influences of Him who hath all power in heaven and on earth and is from everlasting to everlasting. In His name we ask it.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 123. Joint resolution providing for the calling into military service of certain classes of persons registered and liable for military service under the terms of the act of Congress approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following order:

Ordered, That there be appointed by the President pro tempore two additional members of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3752) to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes, and that in compliance with the above order the President pro tempore had appointed Mr. ROBINSON and Mr. CUMMINS as such additional conferees on the part of the Senate.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 123. Joint resolution providing for the calling into military service of certain classes of persons registered and liable for military service under the terms of the act of Congress approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States"; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

HOUSING FOR WAR NEEDS.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 10265, known as the housing bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 10265, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10265) to authorize the Secretary of Labor to provide housing, local transportation, and other community facilities for war needs.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, did the gentleman ask unanimous consent to consider this now?

The SPEAKER. That is what he did.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I shall have to object to that, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee objects.

VACANCIES IN THE HOUSE.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House resolution 261.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House resolution 261. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas there are several vacancies in this House, caused by the death and resignation of Members, and it is of vital importance to the country during this war that all districts be represented; and

Whereas the governors of the States of New York and Illinois have called special elections to fill the vacancies in those States, but that the governor of Ohio, although requested, has failed to call a special election to fill a vacancy now existing in the fourteenth district of the State of Ohio——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee objects.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10358, known as the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10358, known as the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my resolution be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. FOSTER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10358, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10358) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, with Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10358, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10358) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] use some of his time?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I listened yesterday, along with my colleagues, with a great deal of interest to the able Representative from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND]. It was in reference to changing the existing law and writing upon the statute book a compulsory eight-hour provision as it affected the clerks in the various Government departments in Washington City.

Of course, we have listened to many speeches on that same subject delivered by our colleague from Missouri. It has been a continuous performance at every session of Congress, almost upon every appropriation bill carrying pay for Government clerks in times of peace as well as during the war. The gentleman has been here actively in season and out of season riding his hobby. He has become such an expert in hobby riding that I think seriously of commending him to the President for appointment to a high commission in the Cavalry service.

Now, what a severe arraignment was it of the present national Democratic administration, an administration elected upon a platform pledged to economy and the abolition of waste and useless and unnecessary offices! The administration not only obtained power and the confidence of the American people upon a pledge of that kind five years ago, but the pledge was repeated in the last campaign; and here is a gentleman who has been in Congress for nine years, elected as a representative of the Missouri Democracy, a champion of the Wilson administration, in the President's confidence, giving to Congress and the American people a certificate to the effect that the national Democratic administration has failed to keep its pledge of economy.

How often did the gentleman tell us yesterday that Congress was throwing away, by not adopting his oft-repeated amendment, $7,000,000 a year; $7,000,000 a year, and his administration pledged to economy, having controlled public affairs for seven years in the District of Columbia, is a total waste of $35,000,000, according to the testimony furnished by the able Representative from Missouri.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. A little later on.

Mr. BORLAND. Will not the gentleman yield right there?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield now.

Mr. AUSTIN. The Republican Party was arraigned for being wasteful and extravagant with the people's money, and creating, increasing, and continuing unnecessary and useless offices. After being intrusted with power five years it is not necessary for any Member on the Republican side of the House to point out this glaring failure on the part of a Democratic national administration to redeem its solemn pledge. We have as our leading unimpeachable witness the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND]. And by and by, when our congressional election is on, it will only be necessary to say "we submit to you, voters of America, the statement of a leading Democratic member of the Committee on Appropriations, who says that for five years, without a protest, without an effort on the part of the President or any of his advisers, no attempt has been made to save this money."

Mr. SEARS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I am dealing with my beloved friend from Missouri now, and I ask my colleague from Florida to excuse me. I entered this body, was elected at the same time with this great critic of the Democratic national administration. We were both first elected to the Sixty-first Congress. Well do I remember that fortunate day which gave me my first introduction to him. It was in the great city of St. Louis nine years ago. We had assembled there on an invitation to join the President of the United States, the members of his Cabinet, United States Senators and Members of the House of Representatives, governors of the respective States, to go on that great trip on the father of waters—the Mississippi—from St. Louis to New Orleans.

What a magnificent trip it was. The boats were all beautifully decorated representing the various States and cities along the banks of the Missouri and the Mississippi Rivers. Everything was free. There was no bone-dry law in existence on the Mississippi River and the café ran night and day. Bands, music, and speeches on board the boats and at the various landings where the multitudes had gathered to meet these distinguished representatives of the American people from President Taft down.

It was on this wonderful excursion I first met the able and genial gentleman from Missouri. He had in his equipment, as I now recall, a large supply of magazines with a splendid article on Kansas City, Mo., pointing out its matchless attractions and great possibilities. And along with it a great and convincing argument in favor of the Government expending from twenty to thirty million dollars on the improvement of the Missouri River from his town, Kansas City, to the Mississippi River.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. AUSTIN. Can the gentleman give me a little more time?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. AUSTIN. I was soon captured by the persuasive arguments and the genial smile of the gentleman from Missouri, and pledged my support early to the $20,000,000 Missouri River proposition. Along with it was a proposition for a 14-foot channel on the Mississippi River from St. Louis to New Orleans. When the Army engineers got through with that proposition, they said it would cost in the neighborhood of $200,000,000, and they reported against it. I was told that the Missouri River was so shifting and changeable and so fickle that when a man went to bed at night on the bank of the river the chances were the river would be out of sight the next morning.

Mr. MADDEN. Over in the next State. [Laughter.]

Mr. AUSTIN. But I committed myself to his project, notwithstanding the enormous cost. The gentleman was so persuasive in his argument about the improvement of the Missouri and Mississippi Rivers that I have been voting for every river appropriation for the past nine years. The impression made upon me was lasting, and no sum staggered me at all. During this long period at no time, even when the gentleman as a member of the Committee on Appropriations was sending in bills here that carried countless billions of dollars, without any safeguard as to how it should be expended, whether contracts should be let to the lowest bidder or not, I voted for them until my head swam and I was dizzy. [Laughter.]

A little later on I was honored by a position on the joint commission for the construction of national highways. One night we were charmed and enlightened and made happy by the appearance of my colleague from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] at the head of a western delegation in favor of building great national highways.

On January 3, 1918, of this year, when we need money so badly for the war, according to his statement of yesterday, the gentleman from Missouri introduced a bill which provided for constructing a highway over every scout and Indian trail known during the Revolutionary or colonial days. While not fully committing myself to the great, enormous, and far-reaching expenditure of the people's money for that purpose, I fail to find my own State or district named in it, so I shall offer an amendment at the proper time. Mr. BORLAND, on January 3, 1918, introduced the following bill, which was referred to the Committee on Roads and ordered to be printed. It is to be known as the Daughters of the American Revolution old-trails act, to provide a national ocean-to-ocean highway over the pioneer trails of the Nation:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled.

Then it provides for building a highway beginning on the Atlantic Ocean, going through to the Pacific, with side lines, I suppose, to Alaska, Honolulu, and the Philippines. [Laughter.] That is the bill that this great economist introduced in a war period, when he says we ought to economize by increasing the hours of labor in Washington City.

Mr. LOBECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I can not yield.

Mr. LOBECK. I simply wanted to ask if this road came by Omaha.

Mr. AUSTIN. Now, under existing law every member of President Wilson's Cabinet by a stroke of his pen can extend the hours of labor over Government clerks in the city. This proposed law is absolutely unnecessary. It does not require a law. It only requires an order issued by the department to extend the time to eight hours.

Now, I am sure that every member of President Wilson's Cabinet, appreciating and realizing how he obtained office by a platform pledged to economy and the abolition of waste and useless offices, that if he thought it was needed would issue the necessary order and extend the working hour. The gentleman from Missouri has consumed hours of the time of the House of Representatives which might be used to prosecute the war to a speedy termination. We are to delay the signing of the treaty of peace and the closing of this horrible and bloody war, until the gentleman from Missouri can ride his hobby up and down and before the House of Representatives on every appropriation bill from now till the final adjournment of Congress. I appeal to the gentleman in all seriousness, for we are all very fond of him. He is big enough, according to the Missouri standards, to be a Senator from that great State—not according to the Tennessee standards, but according to the Missouri standards. [Laughter.] He has had the training and the experience, he is able, full of energy, trained, tried, and I commend to him to take up a great big proposition which will mea re up with his talents, his ability, and his experience.

Mr. BORLAND. I thought the gentleman mentioned three or four big propositions that I had taken up.

Mr. AUSTIN. But the gentleman has abandoned them, and he is now making war upon some old women and men in various departments of this Government. I saw one of them yesterday on crutches trying to get to his office, and I actually saw one of these old men who had perhaps served in the Army actually pulling himself up the balustrade by all the strength that he had, pulling himself along the stairway leading into the entrance of the department to go to his desk.

Mr. BORLAND. It was on pay day that he was there, was it not? [Laughter.]

Mr. AUSTIN. Oh, no; and there is not a department of this Government, on account of our failure to pass a wise and just retirement bill, that is not filled with old, faithful, worn-out superannuated Government officials, and they are compelled to go there daily, some of them driven there by their loved relatives in the morning, and helped to their desks, and here is a great Democratic leader from the imperial State of Missouri spending his time asking us to delay legislation until he can crowd upon these old, withered, and palsied people an extra hour of labor. What has the war done for Washington? It has made this one of the greatest congested centers in the country.

Everything has advanced in price, all the necessities of life, everything that a Government clerk has to purchase has advanced in price. Everything has advanced except the salary of the Government clerk, fixed a half century ago, and there has been no general rearrangement or readjustment or equalization or advancement in Government salaries for a half century, but all during these 50 years every article which he must have for the home, every luxury, every necessity, every want for his loved wife and children has advanced, and he has become the victim of unfortunate circumstances here in the Capital City of his country incident to this great war. The gentleman from Missouri, not thinking of this, not appreciating this, not considering it at all, is here attempting to have his colleagues place upon these people greater and harder burdens and responsibilities. I object to it. He says that we are fighting a world war for democracy, but here is a great Capital City with three or four hundred thousand people, without a voice in Congress, actually being taxed without representation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman to give me five minutes more, in which time I think I can finish.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I think we are all touched by the graphic narration of conditions in respect to the old, decrepid, and, in the language of the gentleman from Tennessee, withered employees of the Government in the District, and I feel compelled, even though my time is limited, to yield to the gentleman's entreaty and give him five minutes more.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, here is this great Capital City without representation in Congress, and we are taxing its inhabitants. They have no voice in the selection of their local, municipal, or District officials, and yet we are sending our boys abroad for world-wide democracy, to establish and enforce the rule of the people everywhere in the world, except in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes; I yield to my handsome friend from Chicago.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman from Tennessee think that he ought to withdraw a part of the promise he made to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] in respect to the expenditure of these vast sums of money in this shifting stream that moves from one State to another overnight and ask the aid of the gentleman from Missouri for an increase in compensation of these very worthy employees of the Government in the District of Columbia?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, that is a very good suggestion, and now, while the gentleman yesterday devoted some of his remarks to profiteering and attempting to get something from the Government by these humble clerks who are without a defender on the floor of the House of Representatives in the shape of their own chosen Representative, I commend to him the hearings of the various committees on Hog Island, on contracts for military camps, for war supplies, where his own committee has voted without a string to it millions of dollars without restrictions as to how they should be expended, without safeguarding the appropriations in reference to the letting of contracts, and I commend to him that he devote some of his talents to that important and far-reaching work if he seriously wishes to champion the interests of the taxpayer and save him money and for the time being give a rest to the Government clerks, to the watchmen, to the messengers, to the scrub women in the various departments of the Government, leaving to the Democratic members of the Cabinet to determine when public business requires an order to extend the hours of labor in the various departments of the Government. Although not a member of his party, but a partisan Republican, I shall not use my time and voice for a condemnation and indictment of the Democratic President and Democratic members of the Cabinet. I yield that honor to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND]. [Applause.] I yield back the remainder of my time.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. OLDFIELD having taken the chair as speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6361) to extend protection to the civil rights of members of the Military and Naval Establishments of the United States engaged in the present war.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask the attention of the Members to a War Department regulation, which I hope will soon be changed as a matter of justice to soldiers who are properly enlisted, and who are discharged in less than 90 days for disability. I desire also to call attention to some war-risk insurance problems. The people demand that this Nation be fair and just in its treatment of its soldiers and sailors. As a rule, the United States has been fair and just, and I am pleased to report that one unfair regulation is now being adjusted. Recently I received some complaints that soldiers taken into the new Army, who had developed tuberculosis or other disease within three months after enlistment, were being discharged because of disability not incurred in line of duty. I reported one of these cases to The Adjutant General and received the following statement:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, February 20, 1918.

Hon. ALBERT JOHNSON.

DEAR SIR: In response to your letter of the 12th instant relative to Pvt. Gavin H. Bayne, Company M, One hundred and sixty-second Infantry, I have the honor to advise you that the tuberculosis in the case of this soldier was shown to exist within less than three months after his entry into service, and that under the rules of the Medical Department his disability must therefore be considered to have not been contracted in line of duty.

As this case is like many others, the same action must be accorded all, and no exceptions can be made to rules adopted.

Regretting that I am unable to advise you favorably in this matter, I remain,

Very respectfully, H. P. MCCAIN,
The Adjutant General.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Did this man pass the physical examination before he entered the Army?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes. If the gentleman will permit me, I am coming to that. There is a desire on the part of the Medical Department to remedy this situation.

This man, after having been properly examined and enlisted, was found to have developed tuberculosis, and was promptly set out of the Army, the United States refusing to accept the liability it had incurred.

Manifestly, I could not stop with this statement from The Adjutant General, which is based on a regulation made at a time when men were being taken into the Army with great care, and after severe medical examination. I took the matter up with the Surgeon General, and have received the following letter, which will be of interest to the Members of the House and to the public generally:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SURGEON GENERAL,
Washington, February 27, 1918.

Hon. ALBERT JOHNSON.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of February 23, addressed to Gen. Gorgas, the Surgeon General directs me to say that the ruling quoted by The Adjutant General is the ruling which has heretofore obtained, the principle being that men who manifest a chronic condition in less than three months after entering the service must obviously have had the disability before entering the service. It is not believed, therefore, that this ruling is an unfair one.

However, steps have been taken to change the ruling, and the Surgeon General has recently recommended that in all cases a man who has once passed the examination for entering the Army shall be considered to have contracted any subsequent disability in the line of duty.

Yours, very truly,

(Signed) G. E. BUSHNELL.
Colonel, United States Army, Retired.

It will be noted that the Surgeon General has recommended that—

In all cases a man who has once passed the examination for entering the Army shall be considered to have contracted any subsequent disability in line of duty.

Clearly such a recommendation must be approved by the War Department.

I sincerely hope that the recommendation will be considered and accepted. I presume that every Member has had cases of this kind.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I did not hear the first part of the gentleman's statement. Do I understand this is the case of a young man drafted who developed tuberculosis?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Who is held not to be entitled now, under the ruling made, to the provisions of the benefits that we have provided?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes. He was drafted into the Army and passed the medical examination, but within three months this disability was discovered, and it is held that it was not incurred in the line of duty, so he receives his discharge for disability received outside the line of duty.

Mr. WALSH. But there is nothing in the law requiring that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. This is a regulation, nevertheless. These official letters are dated within the last two or three days.

Mr. ROBBINS. How does that affect the war-risk insurance that the man took out when he entered the service?

Mr. WALSH. He gets his benefits.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am coming to war-risk insurance matters.

Mr. ROBBINS. There are a number of similar cases all over the country.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No doubt of it. I suppose every Member has had numerous cases. I might add that as war-risk insurance problems develop every Congressman will find his office work increased greatly beyond its present heavy run.

Mr. Chairman, the case of discharge I have mentioned refers to the Army, and is based on a regulation. Now, let me tell of a discharge case which I have which has been running in the Navy since last summer. It is this:

From southwestern Washington a boy 18 years old, after seeing and reading the alluring posters inviting enlistment in the Navy, enlisted regularly in the Navy out there, went to Puget Sound, and was put on a warship. He was taken down the far side of the Pacific coast through the Panama Canal into the Atlantic Ocean, and the vessel brought up at Pensacola, Fla., where that boy was discharged for undesirability and set ashore without even a street car ticket in his pocket; 18 years old and 4,000 miles from home, without bed or bread—the position of a tramp. That boy wrote a letter from Pensacola to his mother out in the State of Washington saying that he would try to work his way home and that he would go through New Orleans. His mother's friends telegraphed me to see why he had been discharged. I wrote to the Navy Department asking for the reason, and received a short, sharp letter saying that he was discharged "because he was undesirable and dirty." I could not send any such letter to that mother, who has another son in the service of the United States in the Army. I went down personally to investigate. I found that this boy, in the course of that trip in the service, about four months in the Navy, in coming through the Panama Canal had developed an extreme case of dysentery, had run way down in weight, had been unable to keep himself clean, had become sick and helpless, and was set ashore at Pensacola, discharged as undesirable, left there without a 5-cent piece in money, and was informed that he owed the Government $20 for his naval uniform. The boy reached New Orleans by dead-beating his way. With the aid of the Bankers' Association of the United States detectives were employed and that boy discovered and money was handed him to make his way home, where he arrived sick and helpless. The Navy Department afterwards admitted that a mistake had been made and that the boy should have been transferred back to the Puget Sound naval district before they discharged him. My contention is that once the Navy enlisted that boy and took charge of him this Government was in fact his guardian and he was its ward, and it was its duty to feed and clothe him and care for him in sickness and that instead of discharging him he should have been sent to a United States marine hospital. That boy, in my opinion, has a claim against this Government for money expended by kind-hearted friends in locating him and in sending him home and a further claim for the damage to his health.

Now, that is only one case. I have waited months to hear something further from the Navy Department, which has shown some interest in the matter, and I sincerely believe that the commander of that vessel who set that boy ashore deserves to be punished and reduced in numbers.

Mr. MADDEN. He ought to be dishonorably discharged from the service for doing such a thing.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have withheld a statement of this kind because we are at war, and I do not want to do one thing to embarrass the Government, but we can not have our parents believe that their boys are not receiving the best possible attention from those we have placed in charge of them, and officers who do not properly care for soldiers and sailors need to be punished.

Now, to get back to this war-risk insurance discussion. The wife of this soldier, sick with tuberculosis, whose case I just described, has been unable up to date to secure the allotment that this soldier undertook to make to her. Neither has she secured the Government allowance for dependence to which she is entitled, and her case is no different from that of many others in the far West, due, no doubt, to the great distance and the general confusion in connection with the organization of a great bureau. I want to say that before long the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance will be as large as the Treasury Department was before the war began. It is a bureau which was confronted on its very first day with a tremendous amount of work. These facts are responsible for a lot of this confusion. I make no criticism of the bureau, but it needs and will need much more help.

I have another case where a wife was receiving her allotment from the War Department up to the time that the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance was established. Her soldier husband is now in France.

When the War-Risk Insurance Bureau was established the allotment which she got under the law was dropped until transfer could be made, after a new application by her husband. That soldier is far away in France, her allowance is cut off, and a long space of time has occurred in an effort to find that boy in France so as to get a new statement formally made. It has not come yet. That woman is without money.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will.

Mr. FORDNEY. I am not differing with the gentleman, but let me give the reason for this. I have had considerable experience in the same line. The War-Risk Insurance Bureau has no authority under the law to pay to a widow any portion of the soldier's salary until they have received an order from that soldier.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I agree to that, of course. I contend that the transfer should have been automatic. This man dealt with the War Department before the war-risk law was enacted.

Mr. FORDNEY. Wait a minute, please; on the other hand, suppose the soldier withdraws that allotment to the family. Suppose he is in France and draws the money over there——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is true.

Mr. FORDNEY. If the law compels him to pay to his wife any portion of his money, that is one thing——

Mr. MADDEN. It does compel every soldier to allot to his wife.

Mr. FORDNEY. They have no authority to pay the money until they receive an order from him, law or no law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. This man in good faith made an allotment as far as he knew under the law and then went to France. Now, let us see what really happened.

Mr. MADDEN. The law compels the allotment, it is compulsory.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Let us see what really happened in this particular case. Here is a letter from Director Delanoy, of the War-Risk Insurance Bureau, and he advises as follows:

Under the act of October 6, 1917, every enlisted man is required to fill out and file an allotment statement, and unless he does, the bureau is powerless to make an allotment and allowance of his pay to his dependents. A careful search of the records in this bureau has failed to show that said Frank D. Wickersham has filed such an application. The $15 already received by Mrs. Wickersham, as referred to in her letter, evidently came from the War Department before this bureau went into operation under the act of October 6, 1917, and payments from November on are made through this bureau, provided the enlisted man files an allotment statement.

Mr. FORDNEY. Here is where the War-Risk Insurance Bureau's hands are tied. Suppose a man is in France and has a wife who left him and he does not want to allot any more and she has got some right to a portion of his income.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If a man makes an allotment month by month she should receive it until he serves notice that she should be cut off.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman will find that the order of every soldier in every instance is for a specific time.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will.

Mr. WALSH. Is it not true that the law provides that the soldier is compelled to allot that to his wife, and also there is a provision in the law where he is living apart from his wife, she is also entitled to an allotment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think so.

Mr. HAMLIN. If the gentleman will permit, in case this soldier refuses to permit the making of an allotment the wife may apply herself and get it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It runs arbitrarily. Now, a word as to delay in payments. In the far West the delay in making allotments under the system of the organization has been fearful. The delay has caused me to receive a very heavy mail. Almost every day lately I receive a telegram from some commercial organization or municipal organization in my district reading like this one:

VANCOUVER, WASH., March 1.

HON. ALBERT JOHNSON,
Washington, D. C.:

We have men here who were drafted and have now been in the service almost five months who have families and children, and whose pay has been held back because of the allotment to the wife, whose families are now destitute because the allotment due the family held out of the soldier's pay has not been paid. Their families are virtually dependent on charity for houses in which to live and are without credit at the stores, and some of them are in actual want. Something must be done. Why can not the allotment due the families be paid? Applications have been coming to us daily in cases of this kind, and we can not provide for all of them.

W. G. DROWLEY,
President Commercial Club.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In a moment. I wish to call attention to still one more case out in my district. In this case a soldier boy was killed. He was the sole support of a mother who was divorced. That mother was not a widow within the meaning of our generous congressional act of October 6, 1917, as interpreted by the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance. She is not entitled to her dead boy's insurance, which was meant for her and for no one else.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will; yes.

Mr. ROGERS. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his formal communication, which he sent to the Senate some days ago, said that he expected the work of the war-risk insurance would be right up to the minute by the last week in February. Does the gentleman know whether that statement was correct?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I hope it is correct. If it was up by the last week of February that would mean one week later on the Pacific coast.

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly, but is not the great delay, when we reduce it to the lowest terms, owing to the miles intervening between us and the American Expeditionary Forces?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I realize that and I am not making a criticism of the bureau. I am suggesting an amendment of the law. Of course, the War-Risk Insurance Bureau is working hard, night and day, trying to catch up.

Why they have 2,400 employees down there, and they need a whole lot more, and yet we read in the papers right now that another great bureau, the Shipbuilding Corporation, is just about to establish a weekly newspaper, another governmental newspaper. If I had my way I would order all these embryonic editors over into the War-Risk Bureau to help it catch up, and do it right quick, too. [Applause.]

Mr. ROGERS. Does the gentleman know that the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance has recently perfected a plan by which a wife can receive the allotment to which she is entitled from the Government, even though the soldier's allotment for her had not been received?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have no doubt they are perfecting a plan to do it, but I am afraid there will be a lot of red tape about it, and in the meantime I dislike to read telegrams from chambers of commerce and others saying that they can not take care of the dependents.

Mr. ROGERS. I am not trying to defend the bureau, but I think the difficulties are enormous.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I admit that. The bureau needs no defense, but I think we should make some changes in the law.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Of course the gentleman appreciates the fact that this is an entirely new venture on the part of the Government, and that they have to take care of hundreds and hundreds of thousands of cases, and they have to start in anew and get them perfected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Of course. I say that they started on their first day with a tremendous business in front of them, and I say they need thousands of more clerks, and I contend that we should cut down during the war any and every inactive or dispensable bureau of the Government. For instance, the Geological Survey, suspend it and transfer the clerks over there where they are needed. And I am also inclined to think that before we perfect the War-Risk Insurance System we will be forced to set up a branch in every one of the States.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HAMLIN. You spoke a while ago about this divorced mother not being able to draw the insurance of this son. Does the gentleman understand that the soldiers name the beneficiaries?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In this case it was automatic insurance. A letter which I started to read shows that.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will be glad to hear it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. This is from the War-Risk Insurance Bureau of the Treasury Department, and is as follows:

FEBRUARY 26, 1918.

HON. ALBERT JOHNSON.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your favor of the 12th instant in the matter of the claim for automatic insurance filed by Mrs. ———, of Tacoma, Wash., inclosing certified copy of the claimant's decree of divorce from her husband, ———, and in reply would advise that inasmuch as Mrs. ——— had been granted an absolute decree of divorce from her husband prior to the death of her son, she was not a widowed mother within the meaning of the term as used in the act of Congress of October 6, 1917, and as interpreted by this bureau.

If she should be able to prove the decree of divorce granted her was merely an interlocutory decree, which had never been made final, and if she could also prove that the deceased's father, ———, is actually dead as a matter of fact, we would be glad to reopen the matter and give consideration to such proof, but as the case now stands Mrs. ——— is not entitled to automatic insurance on account of the death of her son.

It does not seem probable that the Kreider bill, H. R. 8644, if enacted by Congress, would have any effect upon this claim.

Sincerely, yours,

WILLIAM C. DE LANOY, Director.

Mr. HAMLIN. Now I think I understand that. I think the gentleman will remember that they made an order that all soldiers or drafted men or enlisted men who happened to die before the 1st of November, as I remember it now, would automatically come in under the law as we passed it.

Mr. KEARNS. The law provides that it shall be payable to his estate if he has named no one.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is correct; but here is a case of a soldier boy whose mother deserves her insurance and does not get it. Why, I understand that the mother of the first American boy killed in France is unable to get that boy's insurance because she was a widow who had remarried. That is the J. B. Gresham case—one of the three boys killed in the first German raid on our trenches. His was automatic insurance. My colleague, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DENTON], has the matter in hand.

In this bill there are some clauses pertaining to the method of payment of clerks to Congressmen. So far as I have been able to observe, most Members of Congress use more clerk hire than allowed to them by the Government; and I will venture the assertion that as this war-risk business goes on every Member will need an additional clerk. This matter has hardly started. From my State a large number of soldiers were sent very early to France on account of their knowledge of forestry, and my mail is loaded with problems and questions arising out of the insurance bill, the automatic insurance, and the allotments and allowances.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Has the gentleman any experience in the delay in the transmission of things sent to the boys in France?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is mostly accidental, with some cumbersome regulations in the way.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Not accidental.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. A registered letter can not get beyond New York to a boy in France, and neither can an insured parcel-post package.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Every once in a while a condition arises which is an absolute outrage. I am weary of that condition.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Some of the little things are going wrong, but the big things are going right.

Mr. SNOOK. I would like to ask the gentleman from Washington what officer it is that has the right to say the final word on this regulation with regard to discharge of sick men?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The Adjutant General, first, I presume.

Mr. MADDEN. The Adjutant General has no power over it. It is the President of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, I think the Secretary of War. Finally perhaps it would run to the President.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. FESS. In reference to that feature of the compulsory allotment, may I not read the law?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will be very glad to hear it.

Mr. FESS. It says:

SEC. 201. That allotment of pay shall, subject to the conditions, limitations, and exceptions hereinafter specified, be compulsory as to wife, a former wife divorced who has not remarried and to whom alimony has been decreed, and a child, and voluntary as to any other person; but on the written consent of the wife or former wife divorced, supported by evidence satisfactory to the bureau of her ability to support herself and the children in her custody, the allotment for her and for such children may be waived, and on the enlisted man's application or otherwise for good cause shown, exemption from the allotment may be granted upon such conditions as may be prescribed by regulations.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is the law, of course, but the questions I have presented deal with the transfer of automatic insurance, the position of widows in connection therewith; and principally the discharge of soldiers who become sick during their first 90 days of service, which is not a war-risk insurance matter at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman and Members of the House, the resolution which I sought to have adopted here by unanimous-consent request reads as follows:

House resolution 261.

Whereas there are several vacancies in this House, caused by the death and resignation of Members, and it is of vital importance to the country during this war that all districts be represented; and

Whereas the governors of the States of New York and Illinois have called special elections to fill the vacancies in those States, but that the governor of Ohio, although requested, has failed to call a special election to fill a vacancy now existing in the fourteenth district of the State of Ohio: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Speaker of this House write the governor of Ohio, requesting him to call a special election to fill such vacancy.

That was all my resolution called for—that the Speaker of this House should write to the governor of Ohio requesting him to call a special election in the fourteenth district of Ohio, which was represented by Congressman Bathrick, now deceased. Unless there is a special election called, the fourteenth district of Ohio will be without a Congressman for over a year, because the Congressman that is to be selected this year will not take his seat until the 4th day of March 4, 1919.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

Mr. EMERSON. No; I can not yield now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. EMERSON. To this, my application for unanimous consent for the consideration of this resolution, some Democrat objected. I do not know what was in the colossal mind of a Democrat to object to the passing of a simple resolution of this kind. The Speaker of this House wrote the Republican governor of New York asking him to call a special election in the districts of that State that were without representation, and that Republican governor did it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The districts in New York are Democratic districts. Has that escaped the gentleman's notice? The district in Ohio is a Republican district.

Mr. EMERSON. It does not make any difference whether the district is Republican or Democratic. That district ought to be represented, and a resolution calling upon the governor to call a special election ought to be adopted by this House.

Mr. FESS. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Has my colleague any information as to why the governor refused to call a special election?

Mr. EMERSON. I wrote to the governor two weeks ago requesting him to call a special election in the fourteenth district. I did that upon the request of some residents of that district. He never gave me the courtesy of a reply. Four days ago I telegraphed the governor of Ohio, asking him why he did not answer my letter. I have never received even the courtesy of a reply to that message.

Now, here is what the Speaker of this House said in his letter to the governor of New York:

In these troublous times we need a full membership. Can't you help us out by calling special elections in the New York districts?

Now, if that is true in New York, why should it not be true in Ohio? Why should not the fourteenth district of Ohio be represented on the floor of this House? Whether by a Republican or a Democrat, it makes no difference. And why should a Democratic Congressman object to a unanimous-consent request for the immediate consideration of that simple resolution?

Mr. DILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes.

Mr. DILL. Does a special election in New York State apply to all the districts, including the one of the Congressman now in the Army?

Mr. EMERSON. I do not know how many districts there are. It does not make any difference. Every district should be filled on the floor of this House during this war.

Mr. DILL. I simply asked that for information.

Mr. EMERSON. Every Congressman from the State of Ohio has been called upon to perform the duties that the Congressman from this district should perform and would perform if he were here.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EMERSON. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not know who it was who objected to the consideration of the gentleman's resolution. May it not have been prompted by the idea that if you would go to the Speaker and make a request that he write to Gov. Cox you would accomplish the same thing?

Mr. EMERSON. I will say to my friend that no one has more respect for the Speaker of this House than I. Possibly the Speaker would have written the letter if I had asked him; but after I had written the governor himself two weeks ago and he did not give me the courtesy of a reply, I felt that a letter from the Speaker of this House, backed up by a resolution of this House, might penetrate his stubborn brain. That is the way I thought about it. [Applause.]

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the gentleman could accomplish the same thing by speaking to the Speaker privately about it.

Mr. EMERSON. That may be true.

Section 4829 of the statutes of the State of Ohio provides:

"When a vacancy to the office of Representative to Congress or senator or representative to the general assembly occurs the governor, upon satisfactory information thereof, shall issue a writ of election directing that a special election be held to fill such vacancy in the territory entitled to fill it on the day specified in the writ."

There is nothing but politics in the refusal of the governor to call a special election. The fourteenth district, although it was represented by a Democrat, is normally Republican. The governor is undoubtedly afraid of the political effect of the election of a Republican Congressman from this district. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, some weeks ago the House passed a resolution calling upon the Postmaster General for information concerning the Postal Service between the United States and the members of the American Expeditionary Force in France. The Postmaster General replied in due course, stating, in substance, that the usual time for the transmission of mails from the United States to the soldiers in France was from 15 to 30 days. Subsequently to that time I made some remarks in the House in which, I think, I proved from my personal knowledge and experience that the Postmaster General had been misinformed when he made that statement, and that the average time was far in excess of 15 days; indeed, far in excess of 30 days, which the Postmaster General had cited as the maximum of the usual time in transit.

As a result of that speech in the House I have been flooded with letters from all parts of the country, some from as far as San Francisco, and from practically every State of the Union, giving me specific instances of the accuracy of my statements and of the misinformation contained in the report of the Postmaster General. I have time to read but one of those letters. I read it because I think it is typical of conditions which prevail throughout the United States:

I have recently read with interest of your remarks in relation to lost and delayed mail to our forces overseas. In substantiation of your claim I would like to state my own case, which I have every reason to believe is not unusual among those whose relatives are abroad with the American armies.

Since the middle of September, when my husband, who is a major of the Regular Infantry, went to France, I have sent not less than three letters to him each week, one package of magazines each week, and during the past months have sent innumerable packages containing toilet articles, tobacco, cigarettes, and such eatables as are not barred by regulations—shelled nuts, prepared coffee, chocolate, etc. I have adhered strictly to postal regulations in every particular and have put my return address on every package. In a recent letter from my husband, written January 19—

And at that time, it will be noticed, he had been in France something over four months—he tells me but two letters reached him which were written by me during the month of November (which means about 15 were lost, written that month alone), and he had received but two packages of magazines—absolutely no tobacco, though I have sent pounds and pounds; not one package of toilet articles, though dozens have been dispatched. On November 15 I sent by American Express to New York a Christmas box, value upward of $30. This was taken by transport to France with promise of delivery by Christmas. January 19 it had not reached France, or rather had not been delivered, at least.

My husband writes he worries much about us at home, lest I am ill or the children are not well. Why do I not write? Why do I not answer his questions?

Our officers in France have too much responsibility and too much else to concern them to be annoyed in this way.

And I may say that every man in France, whether he be an officer or an enlisted man, has too much on his mind to be bothered about things of this kind—

I am now sending as many as five or six letters each week, hoping he will get part at least, and am registering some of them.

This letter incloses a copy of an article which appeared in the Paris edition of the Chicago Tribune in January, and which I think is of interest because it presents from the point of view of the soldiers who are in France the conditions as they are prevailing across the ocean at this moment:

Although more than six months have elapsed since the first units of the American Expeditionary Force arrived in France there seems to be very little improvement in the mail service between the various units of the forces now in this country, while the mail service between soldiers and their relatives in the United States surpasses anything America ever has seen before in red-tape inefficiency and callousness to improvement.

Mail between units of the forces in France now requires from three days to three weeks for transmission. The French Government transmits mail over the same respective areas in from one to three days, and in rare cases four.

The Army Edition—

Which is the name by which the Paris edition of the Chicago Tribune is known—has been keeping a careful check on the mail it receives in its shopping department, where from 50 to 300 letters are received each day from soldiers in Europe. Most of these letters come through the Army post office, but a few from isolated units come by way of the French Government post. Almost invariably from three to four times the amount of time is consumed through the American Army post office.

The Army Edition made it the practice to send purchased goods to the soldiers through the American Army post, but several packages have not yet been delivered after one and two months, if they have not been lost altogether. Now an effort is made to send the goods by French express to some town where the buying soldier can call for the goods. In this case the goods are delivered in from one to four or five days.

The reason for the almost insufferable mail conditions in the American Expeditionary Force lies at the door of the Post Office Department in Washington; indeed, of Postmaster General Burleson himself. The Expeditionary post office in Paris does the best it can to handle the mail placed before it, but the force employed is hardly half the number which the volume of business requires.

The officials whom Washington still permits to direct the home postal affairs, seem unable to realize the unusual conditions with which the Expeditionary post office must cope in France. The Paris post-office headquarters never sees a day or a night with the work before it half done. Not only must it handle the mail with an inadequate force but it must turn the mail over to French conveyances. The two systems naturally do not coordinate.

The Army Edition has received several letters from residents of the United States asking us to trace certain soldiers from whom no word had been received for from four to five months. On investigation it was found that some of these soldiers had been writing home regularly, and in two cases had been sending money ever since their arrival in France. There is no way to discover whether or not these letters have been lost or are lying "somewhere in the mails."

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has one minute.

Mr. STAFFORD. At this juncture I will yield to the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I made something of an investigation of this mail situation as a member of the Post Office Committee, and I think it might be illuminating to tell the story, if I may be permitted.

Mr. ROGERS. I should think it would be of extreme value if the gentleman would tell the story, but will he not do so in his own time? I have only six minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. I thought it would be just exactly where the gentleman would like to have it.

Mr. ROGERS. I have only six minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman does not want information, then?

Mr. ROGERS. I certainly do, but I have only six minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. I thought perhaps if the gentleman wanted information I could give it to him, and explain the case he describes.

Mr. ROGERS. How long will it take?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not want to do it now.

Mr. ROGERS. If I can get more time, I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. I shall be very glad to yield time to the gentleman from Illinois, so that he may give this information, which is of value to all Members of the House.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I am not able to vouch for the accuracy of the article which I read from the Paris edition of the Chicago Tribune. I have quoted it here to-day largely because I assume it is believed to be accurate by the people across the sea, and because it is probably accepted as gospel by our soldiers who very generally read this particular paper to the exclusion of other papers, as it is the only one that contains the sort of news in which they are interested, and which they get fresh from the press. I recognize that the Post Office Department is fully conversant with the deficiencies of the mail service, and is seeking to improve them. I think it is working hard in order to bring about an improvement. I am inclined to think that on the whole the responsibility is not primarily with the Post Office Department, but is at least coordinately shared by some other department of the Government. Of course, the Post Office Department does not deliver the mails actually into the hands of the soldiers.

But we are not told what the Post Office Department is doing. We are not informed what plans it is maturing in order to bring about an improvement. I wish that the Postmaster General felt at liberty to take the House of Representatives and the country into his complete confidence as to where the difficulty lies and as to what steps are being taken in order to improve the service. The service really is execrable, and it is an important matter to the waging of this war. There is no question that the morale of the soldiers rises or falls in accordance with the excellence or the deficiencies of the Postal Service to France.

Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department has begun an investigation of this question. I do not know how much progress it has made or is planning to make. There are two requests for rules pending before the Committee on Rules which, if reported out, would mean an investigation of this subject. To me it is a question upon which the best minds of the country should be at work in order to bring about a better condition of affairs. I hope that the House of Representatives may take up the matter and may seek to assist the Post Office Department in making conditions very much better than they are to-day. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. EVANS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I was unfortunately detained out of the Chamber for a few moments and did not hear all of the remarks made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON] just preceding the last speaker. I came in near the conclusion, however, and caught enough to understand that the gentleman was indulging in some criticism of me because I had objected earlier in the day's proceedings to the consideration of a resolution that he presented and asked unanimous consent to consider, calling upon the governor of Ohio to call an election to fill a vacancy which exists in one of the congressional districts in that State. I have simply asked for this time, therefore, Mr. Chairman, to state the reasons why I made that objection.

The Constitution of the United States provides that where a vacancy in representation occurs the executive authority of a State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancy. I do not know that I quote the exact language, but that is the substance of it. That is a matter which addresses itself to the discretion of the executive authority of the State in which the vacancy occurs, and it seemed to me, and seems to me now, that it would be an unwarranted interference, or attempt at interference, with the discretion of the executive of a sovereign State for this body officially to pass a resolution calling upon that executive to perform that function. It occurs to me that it would be an improper encroachment, or attempt to encroach, upon that discretion for this body to take any such action. I think it would be in extremely bad taste. It was for that reason and that reason alone that I made objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would it not be deemed by the governor of Ohio as simply advisory?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, of course it could not be any more than that. There would be no way by which to compel the governor to do it. But the point I make is that it is in extremely bad taste to essay that advice to the executive authority of a sovereign State.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The honorable Speaker of the House addressed a letter to the governor of New York requesting him to call a special election to fill vacancies, when, according to newspaper report, the governor was not going to call a special election to fill four vacancies.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. My recollection is that that letter was addressed to the governor of New Hampshire, but possibly he addressed both the New Hampshire and New York governors. Let me say that I do not think there was any bad taste in that. That was the action of Mr. CLARK of Missouri as an individual making a suggestion to the governor.

Mr. STAFFORD. As the titular head of this body.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not so understand it. He was not then Speaker of the House except as he held over from a prior term. His action was that of an individual Member and in an advisory capacity, expressing his views in an effort to have some action.

Mr. STAFFORD. In the letter addressed to the governor of New York he was at that time Speaker of the House of Representatives and acting in the particular capacity of Speaker, and his individual views reflected the judgment of the House.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not remember when the letter was written, whether during the session of Congress or whether it was after the Sixty-fourth Congress had adjourned sine die; but it does not matter either way, because the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] signed the letter, and not the Speaker of the House. It was, I understand, signed simply "CHAMP CLARK." But I see a very great distinction between one writing as an individual making a suggestion to the executive authority and this body itself passing a resolution and thus attempting official action. That is all I care to say upon that point. Now, if the gentleman from Tennessee will yield me three minutes more, I want to say something about the matter referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I simply wanted to make this statement. I presume I violate no confidence in making the statement. I had occasion upon yesterday to have an interview with The Adjutant General of the Army, Gen. Henry P. McCain, in behalf of a mother who had written me asking me to aid her, if I could, in looking up her son, a second lieutenant in the Reserve Artillery Corps in France.

I presented the situation to The Adjutant General, and he said, in substance, "I am in a position to sympathize deeply with this lady. I have myself a son, a captain in the Artillery in France, from whom I have not heard since December last, and an effort to locate him by cable has failed."

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee permit me to state something in reference to the situation which the gentleman from Massachusetts declined?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes; at the end of this sentence. The fact is, in my opinion, the delay in hearing from these young men is not due to faults of the Mail Service. Of course, I have no doubt that there are some inevitable conditions, but that there is wanton and willful neglect no one could convince me, and the very fact that The Adjutant General of the Army himself could not even by cable ascertain the whereabouts or hear from his own son would seem to me to be sufficient evidence that the fault is not in the Mail Service. Now, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, my investigation discloses this situation. Until recently all of the mail sent to the soldiers in France was handled by the French Government, and no attempt was made to distribute or deliver the mail to the soldiers. Buildings under the jurisdiction of the French Government were literally filled with mail, piled up without even being unpacked.

But no such condition has arisen, I think, since the American Government organized and installed the Postal Service for the Expeditionary Force. That activity has been placed under the Second Assistant Postmaster General, who has jurisdiction over the transportation of the mail, and also over the handling of the mail after it reaches France. To-day the mail is sent to the soldier whose name must be written on the envelope, with his unit, care of the Expeditionary Forces in France, and handled by the postal employees of the United States Government, who are delivering the mail to the regimental headquarters for each regiment. The mail is distributed to the soldiers of the regiment by the organization of the regiment.

There ought not to be any difficulty about delivering the mail now, and I do not think there is any serious difficulty. All the complaints that have heretofore been made or the dissatisfaction which existed was due entirely to the fact that the delivery of the mail was supposed to be attempted by the French Government, but no attempt was made by the Government to deliver that mail. Thousands of men have been permitted, as my investigation shows, to go into buildings where the mail is piled up mountain high, and try to pick out their own mail, and you might as well look for a needle in a haystack. Since we have taken jurisdiction I do not believe there is any just cause for complaint, but, of course, the mail is not delivered as quickly as it could be across the street.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. When did this improvement begin?

Mr. MADDEN. We have only had the organization a little more than a month, and it could not have begun until recently.

Mr. ROGERS. I had two letters this week postmarked in France December 18.

Mr. MADDEN. There is no trouble about getting the mail here.

Mr. ROGERS. There was in that case.

Mr. MADDEN. From all I can learn, they get the mail here as promptly as they could expect to receive it, considering the irregular movement of the ships.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I have had a great many letters complaining, as other Members doubtless have, of the inexcusable delay in the mail of our soldiers in France. I had one this morning from a constituent stating:

> I have just received a letter from my brother, dated February 7, advising me that he has not received any mail from his people here at home. We have been sending him letters, papers, and packages regularly since December 1, and it seems as if most of it should be delivered by this time.

That is just a specimen letter. I have received many similar letters and have referred to some of them before in the House.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to my friend that a great many letters came back from soldiers whose parents had sent them letters, and they were handed to me, and that caused me to investigate this situation, and I am just as well satisfied as one can be from investigation that every effort possible is being made to make deliveries of mail now.

Mr. GILLETT. I hope so.

Mr. MADDEN. And that all of the delay up to within the last month was caused by the failure of the French Government to handle the mail.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I have not the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I intend to support the bill under consideration with the exception of possibly two or three items in it. Recently there has been considerable criticism in the press of the country and by men in high political positions here in Washington of the War Department for its failure to come up to the ideal standard of certain people in the country. It is not my purpose in these few minutes to open that controversy or to enter into it now, but I believe the time has come when all criticism should cease, and we should all join harmoniously in trying to bring this war to as speedy a conclusion as possible by one and all, young and old, joining in the war against the Kaiser and not warring among ourselves.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman does not refer to criticism of the kind that I made a few moments ago, which was directed at legislation in accordance with war measures?

Mr. COX. Oh, no; I do not refer to that at all. What the gentleman said was not criticism but constructive pure and simple. I refer to recent criticisms made by a Senator at the other end of the Capitol. Criticism is one thing and constructive legislation is quite another. I never in my life have had much use for an out-and-out critic. I never had much use for a theorist. I have always all my life endeavored to deal with facts. It may be that has come to me as a result of my profession, dealing in cold-steel facts that surround a given proposition. I have never in my life taken very kindly to simply criticism unless the critic at the time of making it was able to substitute a constructive program that would supersede the other that was being criticized.

My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] a moment ago said that he wished the Post Office Department would take the Members of the House into its confidence. I had an occasion the other day to say that the Post Office was not only ready but willing and anxious to take every Member of this House into its confidence, and if the Members of the House will only go down and consult the Postmaster General about the delay in the mail between here and the fighting line in France I am sure they will get the information they desire.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes; for a short question.

Mr. ROGERS. Did not the Postmaster General in his report say there were no delays?

Mr. COX. I do not remember just what his report did say.

Mr. ROGERS. May I read just one short sentence—"The time required"——

Mr. COX. Oh, no; I object to that. The gentleman can put that into his own speech. As a matter of fact, there are some delays in the delivery of mail to the soldiers in France. There is no question about that. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] hit the keynote. I think the mail is going to the soldiers in France and is being distributed as rapidly as possible. This follows, and will rapidly improve—as fast as the soldiers are definitely settled in their commands. Every foreign government fighting on French soil to-day had for months and months the same trouble that we are having. I had occasion to talk to a man from England the other day who had to do with the delivery of the mails to English soldiers in France for two years, and he told me that they had the same trouble in England getting the mail to and from the soldiers that we are having, and that their trouble lasted six months before they were able to overcome it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And Canada had the same trouble.

Mr. COX. I think that is true. We must remember that down to this time the soldiers are not permanently stationed over there unless it has been within the last 30 days. They are being moved from place to place and shifted around from point to point. Mail is constantly following the soldier on his rounds from the place where he was shifted to the place where he is going finally to land. I know how trying it must be to fathers, mothers, or wives who are trying to get letters delivered to their boys or husbands, but if people will be a little patient I am sure the Post Office Department will finally work that out, because I happen to know that the Post Office Department is exerting its utmost not only to expedite the mail to our soldiers but to deliver it as expeditiously as possible. Enough of that.

Mr. Chairman, I do not have much respect for theorists, and my idea and my knowledge of warfare is altogether theory. I am unable to offer any constructive legislation to the War Department in order to improve conditions, because I know nothing about it. My whole training in life has been in a different direction. Recently we had some rather unjust and stringent criticisms delivered in the Senate against the operation of the War Department. We have had able replies and answers made to it, not only in the other end of the Capitol but here. But the criticism of the way the War Department is handling the affairs of our country to-day, in a large way, is theoretical, and the men who answered the criticism here and in the Senate, though they are able, are again theorists. I would rather take the word of a man who was on the firing line, who is in the camps training, in the cantonments, on the submarine chasers, or on our dreadnaughts, detailing conditions surrounding those things, than to take the word of the critics, however much more eloquent their word may be than the language of the men who actually know the facts.

There went from my district last summer a young man, a volunteer, a soldier who heard the patriotic call of his country, uneducated except in the school of experience, a graduate with the saw in one hand and a hammer in the other, but imbued with all the fires of patriotism. He has been in the service of his country since last June or possibly last May. This soldier, who has never had the opportunity of becoming a graduate of a school or college, except, as stated, in the school of hard experience, wrote me a letter recently from Camp Selby, Miss., in answer to some of the criticism that is being made now against the War Department, and in my own time, Mr. Chairman, I ask that this letter be read and made a part of the RECORD.

In one short letter, in his own language, in his own way, and in his own thoughts, he has made a complete answer to all the would-be critics of the Secretary of War. Remember this answer comes from a plain soldier in camp, drilling day in and day out to enable him to do his duty and defend his country when the crucial and acid test comes for him to look into the muzzle of a Krupp gun in the trenches of France in defense of the flag of his country.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the letter in the gentleman's time.

The Clerk read as follows:

ON THE RANGE, February 17, 1918.

Hon. W. E. COX, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: It is some time since last I bothered you with a letter, but feel like a letter from me at this time in regard to what I've to say may interest you.

Firstly, I will say that our training course is advancing rapidly and I believe our regiment will soon be ready for service abroad, as soon as we can be shipped. I note with great disappointment that many so-called leading statesmen are causing much embarrassment to our military heads with their criticisms of the way our armies have been equipt. Let me tell you, from my own observation in this Camp Shelby, I never seen one case of suffering due to lack of equipment, and as far as ordnance is concerned we have been fully equipt, as far as I can learn, long ago, with the exception of machine guns; and, take it all in all, consider the enormous amount of work to gather, equip, and house this immense army we have gathered in less than a year and send hundreds of thousand across the pond in the orderly and quiet way in which all this miracle was wrought, my words are only those of thanks, praise, and thanksgiving toward the wonderful leaders we are serving under.

I want also to call to your attention that the majority of soldiers are very grateful for the thoughtful way in which our Government prepared ways for them to send part of their pay back home through the allotment process.

And also how deeply thankful we all are for "the war-risk insurance." It truly is the greatest piece of legislation ever enacted for soldiers of any nation in the world, and its liberality is so fine that my poor education makes it impossible to do it justice. It does all it claims and more for the men for whom framed. I can not feel as I do, a penniless man offering the only thing I have to my country, namely, my life and good health; and when I think that this insurance insures my mother and younger brothers a protection in case I may make the supreme sacrifice, and in case I come back a helpless cripple I am independent of a hated pension system, which in my eyes was unjust and graft ridden; and when one considers what this assurance means to men like me, why, I say, some day these men will bless this insurance bill as the greatest thing ever done for mortal man; and let me assure you that the bill was so popular in our company that every man in it took out $10,000 worth, and they will all bless the day they did this; and I am glad I was the instrument that made some of these same men take it after first passing it up as a scheme. Some day I may be able to relate many humorous incidents in regard to same.

But there are other more weighty reasons on my mind why I take the liberty to write you, and it is this confounded peace talk that seems to be sweeping our country like wildfire, and our foolish people and press seems to be taking it up and shouting and proclaiming it so loudly from the house tops that I fear it is even doing our Army harm. Why I've had countless brushes with some of these hair-brained drafted men who hear so much peace talk that their little brains are not in their training, but planning to go home in three or four months, so you can see what damage, untold damage, this damnable and continuous peace talk is doing. It's dividing our people's attention between preparation for a long hard struggle and a speedy peace. And these same people claim they are very patriotic, and yet fail to see that a peace within a year means nothing else than an insecure peace, for Germany in her present position is using all her energy to get the world to talk peace while yet she sits on her dizzy heights of countless victories, and these people are helping this damnable Kaiser yell peace. My God, are they going to let them yell peace until it actually happens, and leave the world insecure in the hands of these heartless barbarians and autocratic beasts? Are we going to "holler" peace and find ourselves in Russia's plight? Or are we going to stop talking peace and sternly face the long years of bitter struggle that are in front of us, to drive these barbarians from power, and really and truly immortalize those noble words of our great President that democracy might be safe for the world?

Our Government is doing its work so nobly and grand that even the meanest partisans can find but few crumbs to chew upon, but isn't it the duty of every preacher, teacher, and writer, and every professional man to start in a campaign to counteract this peace talk that the Kaiser and his agents are spreading here in America.

You have lots to worry and not too much time to waste, but you, through your influence, can turn many people to talk preparation of a long hard war, of great sacrifice from our people, to really and truly crush out this monster, so, therefore, I took this liberty, hoping you will not think me a dreamer, or will not think it a presumption, but hoping you see it in my light.

I remain, your very grateful and respectful friend,

LEO FISCHER,
Corporal, Company I, One hundred and fifty-second Infantry,
Camp Shelby, Miss.

P. S.—We are on the rifle range at present and our regiment had a very beneficial shooting course. We are almost through, and move back to camp soon. Wishing you every success.

LEO FISCHER.

[Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from New York—how much time?

Mr. LONDON. I do not know; 10 minutes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I regret that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], who has been tin panning so long about the eight-hour day, is not here. Either the gentleman from Missouri is a great watchdog of the Treasury, a great statesman and the only statesman and the only man who takes care of the Treasury of the United States, or the head of every department and every member of the Cabinet who has failed to increase the hours to a minimum eight-hour day is an accomplice in a form of graft. I would not have talked about this proposition if an insiduous effort had not been made to bring about the permanent lengthening of the working day under the guise of war emergency. Every rule of efficiency requires a shortening of the working day instead of the lengthening of it. The shallowness of the reasoning of the gentleman from Missouri appears in his own words. He has characterized himself better than anyone possibly could when, in reply to the question by the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], the question being this:

> Does the gentleman think what is paid by private employers necessarily constitutes a fair criterion as to what the Government ought to pay?

The gentleman from Missouri replied:

> Then the gentleman is condemning the American Federation of Labor, which is a private employer with the same class of office force in the District of Columbia. Why, of course what private employers pay is a criterion, because it fixes the standard of wages. What men pay in the market for potatoes fixes the price of potatoes.

Now, that is exactly what the man who refuses to learn would be expected to say. He would have human labor, he would have the value of human effort, he would have the work of men and women determined by what he calls "the law of supply and demand" supposedly regulating the price of potatoes. He would reduce the human being to the value of a commodity, of an inanimate article, and subject man to the law of supply and demand. I deny that there is a law of supply and demand in which the human agency does not enter as a factor. Every trust, every monopoly limits the operation of the law of supply and demand, and every law, every act of social legislation, every attempt to assert the collective conscience of the people in the direction of an ethical basis in the practices between man and man limits, qualifies, and curbs the operation of the law of supply and demand. There is nothing more absurd than to attempt to apply the law of supply and demand to human relations. There is nothing more iniquitous than to say to the laboring man, "I shall subject you to the law of supply and demand. If a thousand men apply for a job, I will have them work 14 hours and will pay them $1 a day, but if 2,000 men apply for the job I will have them work 18 hours a day and pay them 50 cents a day."

It is this law of competition, as it relates to the labor market, that the American professor, Richard T. Ely, designated as the law of the meanest employer. It is the law of the unthinking and unfeeling man. I would recommend the gentleman from Missouri, if that is all the political economy he knows, that so far as the expression "the law of supply and demand" goes the less he will use that expression the better off he will be. It is a rule to which there is no exception that efficiency is brought about by limiting the hours of labor. When you take one hour and multiply it by 8 it does not mean that you have increased the product by 8. It does not mean that in the eight-hour day the eighth hour you can work as effectively, as productively, as diligently, and as fruitfully as during the first hour of the day. You study the law of efficiency—by the way, there is a very scholarly work on the subject by a woman, Josephine Goldmark's Fatigue and Efficiency, in which she has compiled opinions from the best authorities in the world on the subject of the result of fatigue upon efficiency. Study statistical tables with respect to accidents and you will discover that accidents occur mostly in the afternoon, and the greater number of accidents occur during the last days of the week. It is in the morning when you are fresh, when you apply yourself with new vigor to your work, that you are most effective. The question is not whether a Government employee works seven or eight hours a day. The question is whether within those seven hours he does the work required of him. That is the question. And, judging even by Mr. BORLAND'S own standard that what people will ordinarily do in a community constitutes the standard, the seven-hour day which has existed in the District of Columbia since 1898, has by the practice, custom, and habits of 20 years become the standard of this community, and any attempt to lengthen the working-day is going backwards, is retrograding.

That seems to be the only thing a Democrat can do. If he moves at all, he moves backwards. Let him not claim to be the savior of the Treasury—a great statesman. Noise! Noise! "BORLAND, the savior of the Treasury." He will save Uncle Sam $7,000,000 a year, while every head of the Cabinet and the head of every department refuses to save to the Treasury these $7,000,000.

It is about time for the gentleman from Missouri to learn something, to realize that we are not making progress by going backward; that the world's forward march is for shorter hours and higher efficiency and better treatment of every man, and that the Government surely can not afford to be a mean employer.

The only men that will support the gentleman from Missouri in lengthening the hours of labor are those employers who look upon the movement for the reduction of hours of labor as a movement which will ultimately destroy them, the powers of plutocracy, the powers that would destroy every man who sympathizes with the cause of the men and women who work for a livelihood.

You know from your own experience that when you are at your best you are doing in 3 or 4 hours what will take you 8 or 10 hours to do when you are in a state of fatigue, when you are exhausted, when you are tired. Do not measure the value of human labor by the figure "8" or the figure "7." And the contribution which the employee of the Government makes by his seven hours is by the industry, by the intelligence, and the conscientiousness with which he performs the work for which Uncle Sam pays him.

Mr. KEARNS. Why do you say seven hours for the Government clerks. Some of them work 8 or 10 hours.

Mr. LONDON. I am speaking of those departments where they work seven hours to-day. That custom has existed in this city since 1898. It is the custom of the community. It is the practice. It is the standard to which they have become accustomed.

Mr. KEARNS. There is no custom of seven hours in the departments.

Mr. LONDON. I understand that in all the departments in which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] tries to make a change there is.

Mr. KEARNS. His statements do not accord with the facts entirely. The facts are they have to do the work there whether it takes 6 hours or 10 hours or 12 hours.

Mr. LONDON. The work is and should be measured by the product and not by the length of hours taken to perform the work. It is exactly what I am trying to argue; and the man who pretends he is going to confer a benefit upon the American people——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. LONDON. And the man who pretends he is going to confer a benefit upon the American people or save the money of the Treasury by increasing the hours of labor is talking hot air.

Mr. KEARNS. I happen to know that in the Post Office Department here in Washington there has been an order issued to about 200 girls to come back after 6 o'clock in the evening and work until 10 or 11 o'clock at night. Now, that order has been issued——

Mr. LONDON. Because they are short of help.

Mr. KEARNS. And they are not getting 1 cent additional pay, either.

Mr. LONDON. And I suppose that every one of them does the work willingly, realizing that they are called upon to do this work because of the extraordinary situation in which the country finds itself.

I suggest to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] that he begin studying the labor problem. And let him please do away with the talk about supply and demand governing the price of potatoes becoming the law in the relations of human beings. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], who is temporarily absent from the Chamber, has requested that I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] delivered a most interesting address, splendidly expressed, with regard to the coal production of the United States, with some reference to transportation conditions, and the vast increase of exports. Carefully listening to his statements, I gained the impression that most of this was to be accredited to the industrial shutting-down order issued by Dr. Garfield, head of the Fuel Administration, a short time ago. Possibly the gentleman from Illinois did not intend to credit Dr. Garfield with the increase of 64,000,000 tons in our output of bituminous coal last year; possibly did not intend to credit Dr. Garfield with our enormously increased exports and with the partial clearing up of the railway congestion. But such was the impression.

The gentleman from Illinois had a pretty hard task before him, that of attempting to justify the order of the Fuel Administrator which closed down a very large portion of the industry of the country a short time ago. I have no disposition to unduly, certainly I do not desire to captiously, criticize Dr. Garfield. I do not desire to criticize any public official who is acting in good faith, as I have no doubt Dr. Garfield was. The doctor was, I imagine, to a very considerable extent the goat of the railway administration, for even the gentleman from Illinois emphasized the alleged relief of the freight congestion through his order very much more than any relief in the matter of increased supplies of coal. Furthermore, I have no desire to unduly criticize Dr. Garfield, because, I believe, he has unintentionally performed a very great public service.

Unwittingly, no doubt, but nevertheless, he and his order have performed as great a public service as has been performed by any individual or any governmental agency in a long time, for he has again demonstrated, again illuminated, again emphasized the fact known to all thoughtful men and students of history that no government bureaucratic organization can successfully manage the intricate industrial affairs of a great people; that any attempt to regulate or control the industries of a nation through a government bureau is almost certain to result in disaster. It is necessary, it has been necessary in this time of war, to grant great autocratic power. Congress has not granted this authority in the belief that the grant was of itself desirable, but in the belief that under the circumstances and conditions it was necessary and inevitable. In authorizing the exercise of autocratic power Congress has not lost sight of the fact that in the exercise of that power mistakes will be made, unwise things will be done; while we have hoped for the accomplishment of great good we have realized that inevitably harm may be done.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. When Congress authorized great powers to the Emergency Shipbuilding Corporation does the gentleman believe that it was ever intended for that corporation to commence the publication of a weekly newspaper?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, no; furthermore, I do not believe it was the intent of Congress to have an official court journal published and sent to anyone in the Union who desired it at a time when the supply of print paper was said to be so short and so scarce that the only uncensored journal in the United States, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, is not being printed and sent out. That is also true.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Then these powers having been given, and some newspaper of that kind being printed, and another, as I am told, organized, is there any way it can be prevented—any possible way?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, that is one of the difficulties of a grant of autocratic power. There is always danger that it will be abused, that men whose judgment is not sound or whose purposes are not the best may abuse that power.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. When a fuel administrator is looking about for a place to cut off nonessential industries, would it not be a good thing for some of the departments to shut off nonessential side lines of expense?

Mr. MONDELL. Of course. The gentleman knows how dangerous it is to have public sentiment formed, controlled, and molded by official publications, published at public expense to express and reflect the official view.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. So far as I am concerned, I can see no reason for there being a journal published by the Emergency Shipbuilding Corporation except to mold public sentiment in their own interest. I would like to ask the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] what authority he has for the statement that the Emergency Shipbuilding Corporation is going to establish a newspaper?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Only from the statement of a public newspaper here and from the activity of a number of newspaper acquaintances of mine who expect to find employment on the Shipbuilding Corporation's weekly newspaper.

Mr. MONDELL. So many abuses are likely to grow out of the exercise of wide authority that Dr. Garfield has performed a great public service in challenging our attention to the dangers that lie in the granting of great power and authority and autocratic control. I do not know but it is worth all of the great loss and cost, enormous as it has been. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] yesterday called attention to the fact that the people loyally responded and obeyed the order. Certainly they did. No one on this floor ever suggested that they should not. No good citizen ever suggested at any time anywhere that the order should not be obeyed, and the people did obey it, as it was their duty to do, to their great inconvenience, loss, and suffering. The fact that they did obey it, instead of justifying the order, should, on the contrary, teach a lesson and have a sobering effect on those who have great and unusual power, restraining them from exercising it in laying on the people great burdens, great hardships, knowing that their patriotism and law-abiding habit will persuade them to obey, however unjust, arbitrary, and needless it may be. There are a lot of good folks in the country who would try their best to stand on their heads if an order were issued through some officer of the Government to that effect, coupled with the claim that it was necessary for the winning of the war.

Those charged with responsibility ought to be careful as to the sort of orders they issue. As to Dr. Garfield—and I do not want to say anything unkindly of him—I never met him, and I know that he comes from an illustrious family, and I have no doubt he is a well-meaning man. But I can not help thinking of that other doctor that I once heard of, who, lacking experience and training qualifying him to diagnose and cure the ordinary ailments of his patients, adopted the very simple expedient of throwing them into fits, being very confident that he was "death on fits" and could cure that malady. [Laughter.]

One would not think very highly of an engineer put in charge of a great and intricate piece of machinery who, having discovered that there was a little leak of steam, a loosening of the joints, a slipping of the belts, a little troublesome friction, should proceed to try to remedy things by throwing a monkey wrench into the most essential part of the machinery.

The fact is—and the fact can not be changed by any argument made by anyone anywhere—that the fuel order to which reference has been made was a crude, cruel, useless, senseless act. As first issued it was proposed to close down manufacturing industries run by water power, to close down industries drawing coal from mines immediately adjacent to the factory. It did close down industries making the very locomotives that were the prime essential to the remedying of the conditions of railway congestion, in aid of which the fuel order was issued.

There was an unfortunate situation; there was a condition requiring some action. But no such drastic, far-reaching, all-embracing act of despotic power was necessary. It led to great loss and suffering, to the shutting down of industries of vast importance to the winning of the war. It deprived American workmen of millions of dollars of wages and entailed a loss of even greater magnitude to American industry. It accomplished nothing that could not have been accomplished with little loss or inconvenience. It would have been very easy indeed to have worked out some plan whereby the situation, bad as it was, might have been cured, rather than this plan, which, in my opinion, has not commended itself to the calm, deliberate, sober, unbiased judgment of a single individual under the flag.

And yet Dr. Garfield, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, has performed a great public service. He has reminded us of the danger of placing in any man's hands great autocratic power. We have felt it necessary in the prosecution of this war to do that. We may find it necessary to do it further. I am frank to say—I am glad to be able to say—that in the main and in many matters of moment this authority has been exercised with discretion and judgment.

It is my opinion that a Member of this House is not performing a service to his country when, having joined in granting great power and authority because it seemed necessary, he feels called upon to indorse, approve, and praise every exercise of the powers so granted, no matter how patently unwise and unjustified it may have been. [Applause.]

While I have the opportunity I desire to say a word about the class of people who have come to be designated as "alien slackers." We are engaged in a war against the powers and pretenses of arbitrary, despotic military despotism. We believe the liberties of mankind, the opportunities for independent, free self-government among men largely depend on the winning of the war.

Our young men, the bravest and best, are freely offering themselves and their lives to the service of their country and mankind. There are many men among us of military age who are citizens of the countries which are battling with us in this great contest. If they were in their native land they would be called into service; but here, under the protection of our flag and enjoying the benefits of our hospitality, they seek the exemption which they claim their foreign birth and citizenship gives them.

All honor to such of those of foreign birth and citizenship—and they are many—who claim no exemption and freely offer themselves for service. As to those who do not, when both the land of their birth and the land that has afforded them asylum, security, and opportunity needs and calls them, some way should be found to bring them to a realizing sense of the fact that he who will not share the burdens and responsibilities of free government is not entitled to its protection and opportunities.

I am in hopes that through treaty, or, failing in that, through legislative action, these slackers may soon be compelled to serve the common cause either under the flag of their native land or under the flag of the land which harbors and protects them. Of all slackers the one we have the least respect for is he who seeks under the cloak of foreign citizenship to escape the service our own boys gladly and patriotically undertake.

I yield back the rest of my time and ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not expect to occupy the full 30 minutes allotted to me. I am very glad to take the opportunity to address this very large and enthusiastic gathering of the House, and as I have been subtly reminded, with crowded galleries, on a subject that has not hitherto been discussed, but eventually will receive careful consideration by the people of this country.

We are reminded time and again that the fighting of this great war presents problems new and unique to humanity, new and unique to any nation, and particularly to this Nation of ours that hitherto has been peace loving and isolated so far as international entanglements were concerned. We find ourselves under the necessity of sending a large army a distance of 4,000 or 5,000 miles to fight the battles of the Republic. As I said on one prior occasion I now repeat, it is the most colossal undertaking ever attempted by any nation since history began. As time speeds by gradually there will be unfolded to us new problems connected with this great enterprise. It is in relation to one of these problems that is soon to arise that I want to speak for a few minutes.

First let me call attention to the fact that the news which came to us this morning indicates that the soldiers of Uncle Sam on the fighting line in France met the severe shock of battle and met it like veterans. [Applause.] They have during recent days been subjected to the supreme test of all the fiendish characteristics of this awful struggle. They have met the test of attack by the most intrepid and powerful soldiers, and the best trained, that the Kaiser has. They have met the test of the cold and the wet and the rain and the snow, privation and hunger. They have met these great tests in a way that thrills the heart of every American patriot. We are not, however, in any sense surprised. It was apparent to every man who journeyed along the western front during the autumn just passed and who saw the various troops fighting among the allies, saw the Belgians, saw the Portuguese, saw the various kind of British troops, saw the French, and later mingled and abided for a time among the soldiers of Uncle Sam, that for physical capacity, for courage, spirit, dash, all the elements that go to make a man a great soldier in this great warfare, the soldiers of the United States who have been trained and are in France are the best in the world. [Applause.] And there are many magnificent soldiers to-day in the world. However, we have a problem which is very, very serious; and I may be permitted to add in this connection that the people in the United States may take a great deal of comfort in the knowledge that our soldiers who in the shock of battle are wounded, or who fall a prey to sickness, are to receive the best treatment that has ever yet been given to soldiers of any nation in time of war.

The Medical Department of our Army and the Red Cross of this country are doing a class of work excellent in its character, inspiring in all its details, and any mother in this country can know to a certainty that if her boy is perchance wounded, or if her boy is taken sick, he is going to have as good treatment in France as though he were at home, as though he were back in the great country he is fighting for. And we ought to observe as we pass that no small degree of credit for this satisfactory condition should be given to the women of the United States. The men of this country have been working and performing great deeds during the period that this war has continued, but we recognize that we have fallen down in many respects. But, thank God, the women of the United States have not. [Applause.] Perhaps we are behind in machine guns, behind in artillery, behind in ammunition, behind in uniforms, behind in ships; but we are ahead in bandages, we are ahead in sweaters, we are ahead in socks, we are ahead in everything that woman was called upon to produce. [Applause.] I have not yet heard of any strikes among the knitting workers of this country. [Applause.] I have not found any strikes among the women who are rolling the millions of bandages that are going to relieve the suffering in Europe. And if you only knew the value of a clean bandage to a boy who is wounded! Any day along the front you may see men in the best armies in Europe who are obliged to undergo the danger that comes from a bandage that is not new and not clean. But our women already have provided and will continue to provide bandages and Red Cross supplies sufficient so that every man may be kept free from septic conditions.

But it is my purpose to speak on an entirely different subject. Life at the front in this war is a new life to civilization. It contains no elements at all to which we have accustomed ourselves through generations of civilizing and Christianizing influences. Men in the trenches are reduced back to primeval conditions. They live in holes in the ground. They work in the mud, they work in the rain, in the snow, in the cold. They suffer from hunger, they suffer from thirst, they suffer from cold, they suffer from all the elements of nature when nature seems to be at her worst. A man must battle against these conditions almost as primeval man battles against them. But in addition he must battle against all the forces of destruction that a vigilant and capable enemy can devise. He is not simply cold, he is not simply suffering from lack of food or lack of clothing or lack of water to drink, but he is in the midst of ever present danger. A little movement to one side, lifting the head above the trench, walking along the communicating trench in a way that he should not, moving along a highway when he should have been in a trench may mean death to him. The atmosphere is charged with eternal vigilance if a man is going to live.

I realize in all this, no matter how strong a man may be physically, no matter how superb his spirit, he can not stand the wear and tear. There must be a letting up, an opportunity for relaxation. He must be allowed to get out of that hell region, out of the sound of shells, out of the sound of the roar of cannon, away from the danger, away from the cold and suffering, away from life under these awful conditions, and get where there is sunshine, get where there is comfort, get where there are refining influences that he knew in his lifetime, that his whole body may relax and recuperate.

The British recognizing this have perfected an elaborate system of leave. Every day there crosses the English Channel from the British front 10,000 men going back to England on leave. They have a period of rest in England of about 10 days, where they are permitted to enjoy some of the comforts that even exist to-day in England. They get out of that hell-charged atmosphere and the change is fairly complete. There is nothing that can express, there is no person that can express, that exultation of soul which comes to these men as they leave the trenches and know that they are going to Blighty.

I went on a troop ship across the Channel one day, and they filled several trains with troops, and I had a chance to watch them on the train. When we reached London they did not wait for the train to stop, they pried open the doors and leaped out on the platform and yelled, "Blighty at last."

I recall going back over that same route, and after we had landed in France we came up to the British front and saw the boys going back, and these fellows that had been on leave said, "God bless you, you are some lucky dogs." That does not spring from a slacker spirit at all. The British soldiers have the utmost interest and a dogged interest to end the war, and there is just one end, and that is victory, and they do not propose to stop until victory is achieved. [Applause.] There is no sacrifice too great to make without grumbling, but they realize the necessity of having frequent relaxation. They give the men leave once in four or five months. They are carrying that out pretty well.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. About how often does the gentleman say the British soldier receives leave to go to England?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. They intend to give him leave once in four months, but are not always able to do it exactly on time, so that it is four or five months. In the French army we have the same situation.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Before the gentleman leaves that subject I think perhaps Members might get the impression that these soldiers were compelled to stay in the trenches until they made the trip to England. That is not the fact, is it?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. No; they never stay in the trenches more than 10 or 12 days, or perhaps 2 weeks, and then they have a period off.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. They are supposed to be six days in the trenches, are they not?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That depends on the activity in the trenches. In France we find the same custom. There they give the men leave every 90 days, and they go home on permission. It is not any injustice to the French soldier, nor does it do him any lack of credit to say that he looks forward to the period home with a great deal of interest. In fact, I am told that should you deny to the British and French Army this opportunity of relaxation to which I have called attention the morale of the army would decline enormously, and it would be a difficult thing to keep them up to concert pitch.

The Germans themselves have a system somewhat of the character I have briefly outlined, but just pause for a minute and reflect how simple a problem for England and France. Soldiers of the British in France can leave the trench, and on the following day they are in Blighty. They can even leave the trench in the morning, if officers are lucky enough to catch a ride back on some lorry returning from the front—they can get to London that night. French soldiers can leave anywhere along the front line and get to their homes that same evening, no matter where it may be in France, or, at most, on the following day.

Our men are going to be subjected to the same severe trials. They are now subjected to the same severe trials and living conditions. They will have to have relaxation. Where are we going to provide it for them. That is a tremendous problem that disturbs many of our officers in France. Nobody has yet found a solution. There are two or three things, however, that by elimination will enable us to work out the problem as far as its consideration is concerned. First, we can not send them to London or England; second, we can not send them to Paris, nor can we permit them to go to Paris or any other large city. Manifestly they can not be brought home to the United States. In this connection I might observe that I mingled with a good many Australians and New Zealanders among the British troops, and I found the only cause of complaint—they did not care a rap about Gallipoli or the losses they sustained—the only thing that bothered them was that they did not have a home to go to every five months.

Great Britain is doing her level best to accomplish something in relief for the men, and the Canadians have the same situation that the New Zealanders and the Australians have. They are trying their best—the British Government—to bring relief by sending these men to England and permitting them to go in some parts of France.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Has there been any consideration given to having some recreation point in Switzerland available to American soldiers?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. There has; and I shall be pleased to mention that briefly in a moment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, it might be interesting to add at this point that at one time in crossing the channel I saw a small shipload of Christmas cards and newspapers furnished by the Australian Government to the Australian soldiers living in France, post cards from the Government to the soldiers.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes. That is a splendid testimony of the interest the Government itself takes in her sons, something that we might well emulate. Coming down to the problem of the United States, it is not necessary to state how many soldiers we have in France. We have enough, and some of them have been there now for eight months. We all know that it is our aim to get there a million and a half, at least, as soon as we can. It is my firm conviction that by the time the middle of 1919 shall arrive we will have more than 3,000,000 men in France. If you are going to give these men leave every four or five or six months, you can readily estimate the large number that must be accommodated while on leave. Some of the ways that have been suggested to give relaxation to the men we might enumerate, and, first, that to which the gentleman from Missouri has just alluded. It was suggested that our soldiers might go to the Alps, in Switzerland, where in the winter season they could have tobogganning and skiing and in the summer season Alpine climbing, but that is just what they do not want. They do not want to climb mountains, because they have been having all the hard physical exertion that they want. They do not want to go sleigh riding or skiing, because they have been buffeting their faces against the storms of snow for weeks and months already. They want to get away from that. It was then suggested that you might have a large number of sort of Cook's tours, so the men could be grouped together and taken on itinerant journeys through France, showing them the places of historic interest. Believe me, they do not care about those places of historic interest, at least not now. That would be the worst conceivable thing to inflict upon them. That gives them no rest. It might take them away from the sound of shells and take them from some of the awful conditions under which they are living, but it does not give them that relaxation and rest to which they are entitled. I with hesitancy present a plan which is mostly my own, but was suggested in its origin by certain of our officers in France who have been giving a considerable amount of their time to a study of this question. There is a place in France where relaxation can be had, and I call your attention to the southeastern part called the Riviera, near Cannes and Nice.

What attracted my attention to that first, having this in mind, was that I learned nearly all those magnificent hotels about Cannes and Nice are closed, shut up. A very few are open and accommodations given to certain of our officers, who have been down there, and certain others who could afford it, and the expense of the trip even to-day on a small individual scale is ridiculously low. I found on inquiry that undoubtedly those hotels could be operated in such a way as to give men good accommodations with all the comforts they could ask for, for not to exceed $1.50 a day. That region possesses just the qualifications needed for these men.

Mr. COX. Is that a resort of some kind?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It used to be a great watering place, but now it is closed, and gentlemen might be interested to know that all of the people who used to flock to France and Switzerland and other places, to these watering places and resorts, are not there now. They are not allowed there.

Mr. COX. I suppose these places are closed on account of the war?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. On account of the war entirely; but the buildings and the plants are there.

Mr. MADDEN. Who has control of the Mediterranean?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Our allies have control of the Mediterranean up to date, and we expect to keep control. This is entirely safe here. That is a long distance from the German lines, and we hope it will never be any nearer the German lines than it is now. There is no reason on earth why the hotels there could not be taken over on a large scale, all of them, and a 25-mile zone established around that area, a military zone to keep out all undesirables. Those hotels could be opened and fitted and operated as a place for these men to go, and we could make it a second Atlantic City, if you like. I would give them all the foolishness their hearts might desire, and especially have some of the things that I know our boys want. They can play athletic games there every day of the year, for even during winter the climate is balmy and clear. Readily you can see there is opportunity for boating and all kinds of rowing and racing. There is opportunity for baseball every day of the year, and opportunity for football and any kind of outdoor sport you might name, track athletics, everything. The area is sufficiently large to accommodate any number that might be required to go there, and I think it ought to be done. I do not know that our Government will quite undertake the job. It ought to, but we are the slowest people in the world ever to undertake anything of this character.

We look after hogs and cattle and horses and cows and now and then sheep, but when it comes to the comforts and health of human beings, that is not a governmental function. It is each man for himself and the devil take the hindmost, usually, and I do not know that we can ever get our Government to do it; but it can be accomplished in another way. Already the American Red Cross has found it easy to raise $100,000,000, and it is going to raise another hundred million dollars, and every man who puts a dollar into that fund can feel that it is going to a splendid purpose. But this is not a job for the American Red Cross. This should be a job for an independent association, and if there are some American people who desire to put their money where it will do the most good in comfort for the men, let them organize an association, and the capital should run into millions, because this is no small job, and let them take over something of this character and perfect it.

Now, I come to the most important feature of all, and I say it with some deliberation and with all the earnestness I can command. These men at the war front after a period of time are longing for a touch of home life, that touch only woman can give. There is something about the war life that calls men to chivalric thought, calls them to an ideal state, one in which they long for a glimpse of pure, sweet womanhood. They need to know there is that sweetness in life which only the presence of woman can give. In these hotels, which should be rigorously controlled and operated, there should be a home touch, and American womanhood that already has shown its capacity wherever called upon can here perform a signal service. Under a careful system of matronage something akin to home influences can be provided.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Women of especial matronly qualities, with the assistance of such young ladies as might be called into the service, trained and discreet, should undertake this work and give the touch of home influence to these places.

Mr. MADDEN. That could, of course, be done under the direction of the Government, and should be done under the direction of the Government.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I was about to say it should be put under the exclusive control of Gen. Pershing, where it belongs.

Mr. MADDEN. And at the expense of the Government of the United States?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Entirely; because the Government ought to do it at its own expense. I am not certain it will or not; but if the Government will not, private individuals should.

Mr. MADDEN. Why should private individuals ever be called upon for that purpose? The governments of other countries are doing it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. They are.

Mr. MADDEN. Why should not this Government be just as generous as any other Government in the world, and I think we are.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. We ought to do so.

Mr. MADDEN. The men who are sitting here have the decision on that question, have not they?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Then let us do it.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. BUTLER. Why does the gentleman think this Government would not do it, because it is the right thing for the Government to do?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. But the Government is very slow about taking up matters of this character.

Mr. BUTLER. As the gentleman from Illinois said, it could originate here, and there are certainly enough red-blooded men in this House to do this thing.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I hope it will be done and done speedily, and you have no idea what it will mean. For instance, men coming back every four or five months, a team will play a football match, they will play baseball matches, have field events, have races, have tennis matches, going on all the while. Why, it is the greatest opportunity in the world for the development of athletes and clean manhood. Life there can be made so attractive that the men will look forward to it with the keenest anticipation.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course the hotel system runs a great many miles along the coast there?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It does.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know how many men the hotels that are there would accommodate, but a large number, but the chances are if our men on the other side amount to 3,000,000, and they are relieved every four months, that would mean a million men on furlough.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. There would not be that many, of course.

Mr. BUTLER. Fighting men.

Mr. MADDEN. Suppose you would not have accomodations for a million men in all the hotels along the Mediterranean coast?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Oh, no.

Mr. MADDEN. We could provide means by which they could be accommodated easily enough.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I should suggest we ought to make provision for about 250,000 at a time, ultimately, for I think that would be as many as we would ever be called upon to have there, and during another year accommodations for fifty or sixty thousand would be ample, and it is something that needs immediate attention.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. COX. Has the gentleman introduced a bill of this character?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I have not.

Mr. COX. I hope the gentleman will and press it. I think he can get enough men behind it to put it through.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am very thankful to the gentleman for his cooperative suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARLAND. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. GARLAND. As to whether the gentleman knows that there has been action of that kind taken by the Government or intended action?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Not on a comprehensive scale; no.

Mr. GARLAND. I remember three or four weeks ago I went up there with others to get passports for parties going over. We were informed that there was an intention, and especial intention, to establish what is known as an American city down on the Riviera along this very coast.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That was discussed somewhat last fall when I was over, but no adequate plan has ever been attempted or even conceived of. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. May I have the attention of the chairman of the subcommittee for a moment? There is one other gentleman here to whom I would like to yield five minutes. The gentleman asked for it some time ago, and I promised it to him. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT], and that will be the last speech under general debate.

Mr. FOCHT. The excellent speech of the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER], who visited European points, has been accepted with great unanimity, due to the patriotic spirit which prevails throughout this House as well as the country, and I am confident that what he has suggested is workable and would have the support of this House and the Nation.

The other subject discussed here to-day related to a matter that to my mind is next in importance in maintaining the morale of the troops in Europe to that of giving them entertainment while there. On account of the impossibility of their being able to come home on a furlough communication with the home folks, with the home family, with the fireside should be free, frequent, and unbroken. There is nothing that would inspire and thrill a soldier more than the martial music and the patriotic airs of his home country than a letter from the fireside he left when he went forth to battle for his home. A suggestion was offered this morning by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] and other gentlemen, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX] among them, and a spirit not of criticism—far from it—but from a desire to bring about a correction with regard to the transmission of mail to and from our soldiers in Europe. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] said that the failure to make a distribution of mail might be on account of the language in France and it may have been due to the inability to promptly land the letters and the packages. But in support of what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] said, and that it might be understood that these distressing and intolerable conditions exist, I would like to have the Clerk read a letter from a gentleman who would do anything but criticize, who is a distinguished scholar, a gentleman and a patriot, whose son is in France to-day fighting for his country. I wish to have the Clerk read this letter from President Warfield, of Wilson College, Chambersburg, Pa.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

WILSON COLLEGE,
Chambersburg, Pa., February 18, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. FOCHT: Individually and as president of one of Pennsylvania's colleges I have endeavored to boost and not to knock, to support the Government and to abstain from criticism. But there comes a time when patriotism seems to mean to correct as well as to promote the activities or inactivities of the Government.

The outcry on behalf of the boys in France a short time ago was so entirely expressive of my own experience that I venture to ask your interest in so stirring up those who administer the mails as to secure for our boys at the front the enjoyment of the many efforts that are put forth for their happiness.

That they are not getting their letters or packages I know from the experience of my own boy and what he writes me of those who are with him. My family is a large one and my son in France has been sent several letters every week and a large number of packages, beginning about November 1. Some of the packages that arrived had been plundered of their contents, and the poignancy of this kind of disappointment only those who have served at the front are able to understand.

He complained in October that he was not able to keep his feet warm or to get warm socks in France. I sent him a large package from Philadelphia on November 3, which I know was properly addressed, and it had not reached him January 12.

He writes:

"December 25: We had a very nice Christmas, though I have not had a letter for six weeks and no package has arrived, but I will keep my eye open and have a long Christmas, extended through the 'guerre,' if necessary."

"January 17: Letters are rare things here. I have had only one from you all winter, in December, one from papa, and only one from E., so that altogether, adding the wet, rainy weather, I feel like 'going out in the garden to eat worms.' But that, I fear, would not be economical as long as I have received one box of books and one box of chocolates, and you say others are coming."

A large number of magazines have been regularly sent, none of which has reached him except an occasional number of the Independent. Among the magazines which have been sent and which have not reached him are the Red Cross, Literary Digest, National Geographic, Harper's, Scribner's, and others. Packages of books, packages of chocolates—only two out of many have been received intact—knit goods, sweater, helmet, socks.

Many of these things have only been intended for recreation and relief from the strain of service, but some of them have been to replace the inadequate clothing supplied by the Government.

What I feel for my boy tens of thousands are feeling for their boys—and they are all "our boys."

Yours, very truly,

E. D. WARFIELD.

Hon. BENJAMIN K FOCHT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOCHT. I wish but a second to say that I have submitted this letter in order that the country may know the conditions that prevail in specific instances and that it is not some vague and unsupported rumor we are discussing.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks made to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

SENATE.

For compensation of Senators, $720,000.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wanted to say a few words only along the lines of efficiency and the getting out of work during this war in the shipyards and in all the operations that have been taken over and taken charge of by the Government.

It will be well remembered that in the Sixty-fourth Congress when these several large appropriation bills passed with reference to Navy work and Army work that onto each of them was hitched an amendment providing that no man should be required to work on the time-measuring system, and that the system then established in the navy yards be abolished. And I charge it largely to the impracticability of the Democratic side, and among others, I believe, too, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND], who, I think, voted in that particular way and who now proposes to get more efficiency from the employees by increasing the number of hours of labor. But there is no other thing as efficient as giving men piece or tonnage work in shops and mills and factories. And I speak from absolute experience.

Only about three weeks ago, I think it was, an article appeared in the Washington Post, of several columns in length, deploring the fact that in every shipyard of the United States the output had "fallen way off," and further stating this fact: That the average number of rivets driven by an individual prior to the war and the taking over of these works by the Government, or, rather, the supervision of them, was 350 per day, and that the same individuals were now driving but 130 rivets per day, a falling off of from 350 to 130. Now, at the time these measures were up it was conceded that there would have to be some effort to try to incite work, although the necessity for it did not seem as plain as now. But the gentlemen on that side, almost to a man, stood up and voted to eliminate the right to reward men for work on piecework. Now, a man that is working in these shipyards must have some incitement to cause him to work, or else he will not do all that he can do, and it is true we need the output and we want the men to be content. The prices of living are advancing all the time, and by having the right to work on piece or tonnage work and not adding one minute more to the hours of employment, it would increase the output in that way and in the direction I have just stated. I have seen time and again in factories and in mills going from the use of the day's work to that of output, where the increase, starting at $40 a month—and this is in railroad shops—ran up to $65 a month in less than two months, and shortly after doubled. That is an established fact in some shops over in the State from which I come.

I think there is where the last Congress erred very much; and it seems to me if we want to remedy this matter, if we want to get the output, if we want to stop strikes, if we want to have the men content, we should permit the practice that was in force before the passage of the decision against it by the last Congress.

Mr. COX. The gentleman is making, to me, a very interesting and instructive statement. As I understand the gentleman now, he is taking the position of favoring the pieceworkers?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes, sir; and I did at that time.

Mr. FOCHT. Bonus.

Mr. GARLAND. It is not bonus; it is piecework.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Peunsylvania be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. What is the position of organized labor on that? Does the gentleman know?

Mr. GARLAND. It varies. A large number of the organizations favor and use piecework entirely. The trade to which I belonged, that of iron and steel workers, uses tonnage work. It has always done it.

Mr. COX. What is the policy in that regard of the organization known as the American Federation of Labor?

Mr. GARLAND. It has no decided policy, except that some of our trades affiliated with the American Federation of Labor prefer daywork and decide for that. As a matter of fact, that is where the mistake came in here. They do not declare in any of their conventions for entire daywork. Some of the organizations, I believe—among which are the machinists and others—do declare for daywork only.

Mr. COX. If I recall correctly, the American Federationist, the paper or organ of the American Federation of Labor, when this contest was going on heretofore in regard to the stop-watch system, stated that the test of the friendship of Members of Congress was soon to come on the vote on the stop-watch question.

Mr. GARLAND. There was not a resolution of the American Federation of Labor as a whole asking Congress to vote against it that I am aware of.

Mr. COX. It was stated that piecework had a tendency to overspeed the men and affected their physical endurance, and things like that. What does the gentleman think of that?

Mr. GARLAND. I do not think it does. It is claimed that situation occurred down here under what is known as the Taylor system. As a matter of fact, no one can determine the cost of operation of making a single article in iron or steel or any other article in any other line of manufacture unless they measure it by some kind of time and wage computation, and the attempt at that time was not to permit the use of the clock and thereby determine the cost of an article. I claim that by using a system of piecework you can more readily and more fully determine the cost of the production of an article. But it seems to me the Democrats were so intent on taking the industry of armor-plate making from the State of Pennsylvania they did not want that kind of legislation.

Mr. COX. The gentleman is correct. I want to say to the gentleman that in my little town there are three desk factories, and the ambition of every man working there is to be put on piecework, where they get seven or eight dollars a day. When a man gets to doing piecework he is not overworked at all.

Mr. GARLAND. A man used to drive 350 rivets as an average day's output before the war in these shipyards, but owing to its being Government work and owing to the laws passed by the Sixty-fourth Congress, which I have already explained here, they went onto the basis of daywork, and the same authority in the newspaper article I referred to says that they are now driving 130 rivets a day and consider that a day's work.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question, inasmuch as he is regarded in Pennsylvania as the fountain to which we go on the labor question. I would like to know what the distinction is as to the piecework method and the bonus system which is in operation where they are making shells for the Government. As I understand, they pay them $3 a day for a whole day, and a certain percentage above a certain number of shells that they grind. How does that relate to this policy in regard to the piecework system, which you say they were prohibited from using at a certain time? I know that they are working on the bonus system in Government work.

Mr. GARLAND. On daywork they do a day's work irrespective of the amount turned out. If they are working on piecework, they agree to pay them on the piecework plan, and that, I insist, incites a man to greater effort; he does more work and not one minute more of labor.

Mr. ROBBINS. They work the same length of time?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes. They work the same length of time, but it keeps them from loafing on the job. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing letters from the Secretary of War and the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior respecting proposed water-power legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the document indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I did not understand what the document was.

Mr. SIMS. It is a letter from the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture respecting proposed water-power legislation, addressed to me as chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. It is an official document.

Mr. WALSH. Has it not been included in the hearings?

Mr. SIMS. No. I have just received it. The hearings have not been commenced.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the letter referred to:

WASHINGTON, February 27, 1918.

Hon. T. W. SIMS,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SIMS: It is understood your committee will take action at an early date upon various proposals which have been made concerning water-power legislation. On account of the conditions now affecting the power industry and the need of maintaining our entire industrial machinery at its highest efficiency, a satisfactory solution of the water-power problem is, in our judgment, one of the most important steps for the consideration of this Congress and one which should receive attention at the earliest practicable date.

The industrial expansion which has been necessary in order to produce the materials and equipment needed in the prosecution of the war has placed unprecedented demands upon the electric-power industry, to such an extent in fact that the output of commercial central stations has increased more than 60 per cent since 1914. This increase has been greatest in the manufacturing sections of the East where water-power development is comparatively limited, and has been chiefly in the form of steam-generated power, because steam power can be developed more quickly and at less capital cost than water power. This increase in power output has taken place notwithstanding advances in costs of construction and of operation.

While the form of bill which has been presented for your consideration is directly concerned with water-power development only, an adequate solution of this problem will have a favorable and stabilizing effect upon the whole power industry. Probably no considerable increase in new water-power development can be expected immediately, but legislation is urgently needed in order to put existing water-power developments, which have been made under inadequate law, into a position of security which will enable them to make extensions and to meet maturing obligations upon favorable terms.

There is also need of legislation in order that time may be given to prepare for the developments that must take place after the close of the war, if the United States is to maintain its proper place in world trade, or even to supply its domestic needs. A survey of our water-power resources is needed, particularly with relation to specific districts and specific industries. The various establishments of the Federal Government which have had to do with the administration of water power should be coordinated through a single agency, and as far as practicable all agencies, Federal, State, and private, should be brought into cooperation. It is urgently recommended that a Federal power commission be established as provided in the proposed bill and be given ample authority to undertake this work of preliminary investigations.

Beyond the need of power development as such is the need of increasing the proportion of water power in order to reduce the drain on our coal and petroleum supplies, particularly the latter. Even if the coal supply were unlimited, the reduction in the demands upon labor and transportation equipment would be sufficient reason for substituting water power for steam power whenever possible. The petroleum supply, particularly in the West where the greatest proportion is used for fuel, is being rapidly depleted, consumption has exceeded production and stocks in storage are fast disappearing. With the substitution of water power for steam power in central stations and with the electrification of railroads, a large part of the use of petroleum for fuel could be eliminated.

Water-power legislation should have in view not only the maintenance of the rights of the public in the national resources, but also the adequate protection of private capital by which such resources are developed. The bill before you aims to do both. After careful consideration, however, it is believed that certain changes in language could be made which would more clearly express the intent of the proposed legislation.

It is particularly important that the conditions which affect the disposition of the property at the termination of the license should be so definite that uncertainties will be reduced to a minimum. If the properties are not taken over, the conditions under which a new license may be secured should be entirely clear. If the properties are taken over, the price to be paid should not include alleged values not represented by investment, or, on the other hand, require needless amortization of capital during the period of the license in order to protect the investment. It is, therefore, believed advisable to define in specific language the items which should or should not enter into the price to be paid. The following definition which it is recommended should be inserted at the end of section 3 has been prepared after thorough consideration and after consultation with accounting and banking experts. It is believed to be eminently fair from the point of view of the public and of the investor. The use of this term will require certain changes in other parts of the bill, particularly section 14:

"'Net investment' in a project means the actual legitimate original cost thereof as defined and interpreted in the 'Classification of investment in road and equipment of steam roads, issue of 1914, Interstate Commerce Commission,' plus similar costs of additions thereto and betterments thereof, minus the sum of the following items properly allocated thereto, if and to the extent that such items have been accumulated during the period of the license from earnings in excess of a fair return on such investment: (a) Unappropriated surplus, (b) aggregate credit balances of current depreciation accounts, and (c) aggregate appropriations of surplus or income held in amortization, sinking fund, or similar reserves, or expended for extensions or betterments. The term 'cost' shall include, in so far as applicable, the elements thereof prescribed in said classification, but shall not include expenditures from funds obtained through donations by States, municipalities, individuals, or others."

The language of section 6, which fixes the period of the license, has been changed somewhat in order to make its intent more clear and in order to make certain that there shall be no time when the holder of a license may not have the privilege of receiving a new license if the properties are not taken over either by the United States or by a new licensee.

Certain other changes, minor in character, have been made for the purpose of clarifying the language or improving the form of the bill. All these changes are shown upon the attached copy of the confidential committee print.

Very truly, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.
FRANKLIN K. LANE,
Secretary of the Interior.
D. F. HOUSTON,
Secretary of Agriculture.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Secretary: Secretary of the Senate, including compensation as disbursing officer of salaries of Senators and of contingent fund of the Senate, $6,500; assistant secretary, Henry M. Rose, $5,000; chief clerk, $3,250; financial clerk, minute and Journal clerk, principal clerk, and enrolling clerk, at $3,000 each; reading clerk, $3,600; executive clerk, and assistant financial clerk, at $2,750 each; librarian, file clerk, chief bookkeeper, assistant Journal clerk, and printing clerk, at $2,500 each; first assistant librarian, and keeper of stationery, at $2,400 each; assistant librarian, $1,800; skilled laborer, $1,200; clerks—3 at $2,500 each, 4 at $2,220 each, 2 at $2,100 each, 1 $1,800, 2 at $1,600 each, 1 $1,440; assistant keeper of stationery, $2,000; assistant in stationery room, $1,200; messenger, $1,440; assistant messenger, $1,200; laborers—3 at $840 each, 3 at $720 each, 1 in stationery room $720; in all, $94,410.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, this morning in the general debate two Members of the House came valiantly to the defense of the profiteers in Washington who are the beneficiaries of the seven-hour law, and they did me the honor to refer rather pointedly to me in person. One of them was the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] and the other the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

Now, as to the gentleman from New York, I have always had the misfortune since he has been a Member of this House of not being able to communicate with him. For some reason or other he and I do not speak the same language. I have never been able to arrive at his mental processes. It may be my misfortune. If so, I am too old to change, but I do not either read, speak, or understand the bolshevik language, so that I am at loss to discuss his proposition. [Laughter.]

But it is quite otherwise with the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee. I think I understand clearly what he says. The gentleman from Tennessee has had a unique reputation in this House, and I rather think, if I am not mistaken, that he has somewhat gloried in it. He has taken the position, as I understand, that he never votes against any appropriation and never votes for any tax. By some strange system of magic all of these beautiful expenditures that he is in favor of come out of a clear blue sky, and none of them come out of the pockets of the American taxpayer. None of them represents the sweat and blood of our constituents, according to his beautiful optimistic ideas and statements. I wish I could subscribe to them.

He never wants to levy a tax on the American people. He wants the other Members of Congress to do that; but he always wants to vote for an appropriation. Now, that is a very beautiful theory. It is a good rule to go by, but, like all rules, there are exceptions. They say it takes an exception to prove the rule, and this particular rule of the gentleman from Tennessee has had one conspicuous exception. In the 10 years I have served with him I have never known him to vote against any appropriation except one, and that was the appropriation for the investigation of the Beef Trust. When the appropriation came before this House for the investigation of the Beef Trust, that had the American farmer by the throat, the gentleman from Tennessee voted against that appropriation. Why, he not only voted against it, but he worked with feverish energy over here at the door as his colleagues were coming in to vote on the floor. He was determined to beat that investigation. That is the sole exception that I know of. Now, I do not know how the gentleman is going to explain to his farmer constituents in eastern Tennessee why they should work 12 and 14 hours a day in the field to support seven-hour clerks in Washington, but I understand even less how he is going to explain to his farmer constituents why, when he never votes against an appropriation——

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. What right has the gentleman to discuss the previous votes or conduct of the gentleman from Tennessee on a motion to strike out the last word of this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order against the gentleman's remarks?

Mr. KEARNS. I do.

Mr. BORLAND. Then I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must proceed in order.

Mr. BORLAND. I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

Mr. KEARNS. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. To which objection is made.

Mr. BORLAND. I will endeavor to proceed in order.

Mr. BUTLER. Can you do it?

Mr. BORLAND. I can. I would not refer by name to any gentleman in this House. I want simply to explain the necessity and bearing and some of these expenses that we are now levying on the American people. I have noticed, however, that there are a certain class of gentlemen in the House who always come valiantly to the rescue whenever the special interests are attacked.

Mr. MADDEN. What does the gentleman mean by that—"when special interests are attacked"?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, that is not a question of order. If the gentleman will pardon me, I have been held down here to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. MADDEN. There is nothing before the House dealing with "special interests."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri must speak, of course, with reference to what is before the committee. The Chair would not hold that a reference to "special interests" was out of order, but as the Chair understands, the gentleman has made no motion.

Mr. BORLAND. I moved to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the gentleman must speak to that.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman must speak to the motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. BORLAND. Gentlemen are getting very sensitive on that side of the House. I do not blame them, but I am very glad to say that I do not refer to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Illinois needs no defense from the gentleman from Missouri.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri must proceed in order.

Mr. BORLAND. I renew my request to speak for five minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent for five minutes to speak out of order. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I notice that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] has returned to the Hall of the House. I renew my request to speak for five minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order. Is there objection?

Mr. AUSTIN. I hope the request will be granted, and I regret I was not here to hear the gentleman's interesting talk.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman from Tennessee requests that the gentleman from Missouri be given the time, of course I am not going to object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? No objection is heard. The gentleman from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I regret also that the brilliant gentleman from Tennessee was not present when I began my remarks. I was discussing his attitude toward appropriations and expenditures in this House, and I recalled the fact that during our service here, which has been equal in length of time, my understanding has been that he never voted against an appropriation and never voted for a tax; but I called attention to one conspicuous exception to that rule. That was the appropriation made in this House for the investigation of the Beef Trust. In that particular instance the gentleman overstepped his usual rule and voted against the appropriation.

As I say, it may be somewhat difficult, to my mind, for the gentleman to explain to the farmers of eastern Tennessee why they should be taxed for seven-hour clerks in Washington.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BORLAND. No; I regret I can not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BORLAND. But it would seem more difficult to my mind to explain to them why, in view of the revelations which have come out in regard to the activity of the swarm of attorneys for the Beef Trust who were here in Washington, the gentleman from Tennessee should vote against that particular appropriation when he was universally in favor of all other appropriations. I said that whenever the special interests were attacked in this House there were always gentlemen ready to come to their defense, whether it was the profiteers of Washington or any other class.

> How sweet to hear the watchdog's honest bark
> Bay deep-mouthed welcome as we draw near home.

[Applause.]

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask the indulgence of the House for five minutes. I regret that I am unable to answer that part of the gentleman's [Mr. BORLAND'S] speech, which was delivered in my absence from the floor of the House. I believe the gentleman was present this morning when I discussed him, and attempted in my feeble way to answer his observations of yesterday. In reference to his statement that I never vote against an appropriation, although I began pledging myself to enormous expenditures of money under the spell of his magic while on that wonderful Mississippi River trip—$230,000,000 at the very beginning of our acquaintance—I want to tell him that on several occasions here in the House I have voted against appropriations. I voted against the appropriation giving the Members of the House of Representatives their mileage; that is, I voted in favor of putting it on the actual amount expended rather than the 20 cents per mile basis. I do not know how the economist from Missouri voted on that proposition and I do not care.

This proposition about investigating the Beef Trust—I think the gentleman will find in the RECORD that I have consistently opposed and voted against all the so-called Democratic investigations from the Sixty-second Congress down to the present Congress, which I considered simply a waste of time and the public money in order to furnish gentlemen on that side for partisan purposes campaign material and not to advance the interests of the taxpayers.

The Beef Trust investigation was a proposition to investigate the high cost of living; that was the propaganda and the argument made in the House of Representatives. I took the position that all we needed to stop the high-cost-of-living prices was the enforcement of present laws and the indictment by the Federal grand jury of the packers and other people who were attempting to oppress the people; that we were paying for the expenses of the necessary prosecuting attorneys and assistant prosecuting attorneys who had access to Federal grand juries, and instead of wasting this money—$250,000—to furnish jobs for Democratic office seekers we should put the district and assistant attorneys appointed by President Wilson to work in the Department of Justice and in every Federal courthouse in the United States to investigate before the grand juries the doings of the packers and all other people who were seeking to advance the price of the necessities of life and who were outraging the American people rather than to dissipate the money and time in a political investigation originated by the gentleman in favor of cattle raisers in his district for whom he seemed to be the special champion.

The Clerk read as follows:

For captain, $1,800; 3 lieutenants, at $1,200 each; 2 special officers, at $1,200 each; 47 privates, at $1,050 each; 10 additional privates, at $840 each; one-half of said privates to be selected by the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and one-half by the Sergeant at Arms of the House; in all, $65,550.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Under this item for Capitol police is there any provision for these so-called Capitol guides, or are they anywhere taken care of in this bill?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They are not.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. What are the duties of Capitol guides with regard to being in any sense under the control of the authorities in charge of the Capitol?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They are permitted, as I understand it, to act as guides here in the Capitol under a permit which they receive, and they are permitted to receive such compensation as is given them by those who employ them.

Mr. DYER. Who gives the permit to these gentlemen?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am informed that the Sergeant at Arms of the House and the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate jointly issue these permits. Probably one issues one half of them and the other the other half.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Do the Sergeants at Arms have any authority of law for this, or is it a long-established practice and custom that they are following?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is a custom that has obtained for many years, and I assume that they have taken jurisdiction of it, because they have jurisdiction in the Capitol.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Of course my remarks should not be interpreted as meaning that I hint that there is anything wrong on the part of those who have followed the practice or custom, but it gives me this opportunity to suggest to the gentleman's committee, with his permission, that it seems to me there is something strangely inconsistent in the administration of a democratic form of government when a citizen who comes to this Capitol has to pay 25 cents to see his own building.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is, of course, not necessary unless he desires to do it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is what he does.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If he wishes to go through the building without an escort, he can go through.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I understand that; and yet, by way of contrast, at the Treasury Department, for instance, when the visitor presents himself—and that is his building, too, in the same general sense—he is met by a guide who takes him about and shows him his own property.

Mr. MADDEN. He could not steal anything up here except a Member of Congress, and they do not care if he does do that.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, there have been repeated attempts to get these guides put on the pay roll, and a great many arguments have been urged in favor of it, among others the argument of the gentleman from Vermont, that the public ought to have free service. Of course, the public does not have to pay those guides unless it chooses to do so. The building is free and it is policed. The guides are supervised by the Sergeant at Arms, and they are kept in order and their fees are kept within limits and they are respectable, law-abiding men. That is the only object in licensing them.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. The guides will not show a man through unless they are paid.

Mr. BORLAND. It is a fee which is voluntarily given on the part of the visitors; but it is apparent that if the guides were put on the pay roll and paid a salary, and distributed around as patronage among the Members, that exactly the same thing would occur that now occurs in respect to the barbers. A Member of Congress who patronizes the barber shop pays the same price exactly for the service that he would have paid if the man was not on the public pay roll. The only difference is that the public pays an additional price. That would be the only difference here in the practical operation of it. For a short time there might be free service given by a few guides, but you can not prevent the American public from tipping that class of service. You can not prevent it by law or in any other way, and the public would begin to do it and it would become a custom.

Mr. DYER. Can not you prevent the guide from accepting it?

Mr. BUTLER. Is it impossible to put the obligation upon the American Republic?

Mr. BORLAND. But you can not prevent the public from giving the quarter extra.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman understand that tipping is an absolute necessity?

Mr. BORLAND. Some believe it is a necessity.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It seems to me absolutely belittling the dignity and majesty of this Government and all of its theories of democratic ownership and equality of rights of the owners that when a man comes here from across the continent, maybe, to see the property he has been told by the school books he owns, he is held up at the door of the great Capitol of this great Nation and has to pay a quarter to see it.

Mr. BORLAND. No. He is not held up at the door.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It is a distinction in terms and not in effect; in language, and not in what it amounts to the pocketbook. That is all. Even if it is true that the visitor has his option of paying or not paying to have the features of interest in his own Capitol shown to him and explained to him, the fact is that if he does not pay he is not shown them and they are not explained, while other people, willing to pay and having the money to pay, have all that courtesy extended to them. I believe that some arrangement should be made whereby guides, paid by the Government, shall regularly conduct parties of sightseers about the Capitol Building without exacting any fees from the visitors themselves.

Mr. BORLAND. If we had the guides on the pay roll the man whom the guide suspected would not tip would not find a guide. There might be plenty of guides, but he could not find them.

Mr. MADDEN. Does this illustrate what would happen in the case of great business enterprises controlled by the Government?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman in charge of the bill with reference to the item on page 10, beginning line 10, in reference to the automobile provided for the Vice President. Can the gentleman state how long the present automobile has been in use?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It was purchased in July, 1914, nearly four years ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move an amendment, on page 11, line 12, after the second word "each," to strike out "one-half" and all of lines 13 and 14 and insert "said privates to be selected by the Superintendent of the Capitol."

Mr. FOSTER. I reserve a point of order on that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GOOD. It is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know whether it is or not. I want to find out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GOOD: Page 11, line 12, after the second word "each," strike out "one-half" and all of lines 13 and 14 and insert "said privates to be selected by the Superintendent of the Capitol."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, as I understand, one-half of the amount appropriated for the policing of the Capitol is disbursed by the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and one-half by the Sergeant at Arms of the House. One-half of this police force is selected by the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and the remaining half by the Sergeant at Arms of the House, and now for the remainder of this year the Superintendent of the Capitol will select the persons to be added to this force, who will be under his direction.

The point brought out by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] was that we are dividing here the responsibility of a little army brought here to protect the Nation's Capitol, to preserve the property, and yet we are scattering the responsibility, so far as dividing the command of that army among three officials of the Government is concerned. There ought to be one man responsible for that force—one man responsible for any depredations to the Government property here at the Capitol—and I do not believe you will ever get that desired responsibility until you place the control in one single person. I do not know whether Mr. Elliott Woods, the Superintendent of the Capitol, is the person to be in command of this force or not, but I do know that that responsibility—and it is a great responsibility—ought not to be vested in three persons. It ought not to be vested in two persons. There ought to be but one responsible head, and it seems to me that when a suggestion is made that is so eminently sound and businesslike as that made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] our committee and this House ought to adopt it.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment proposes to place the Capitol police force all under the control of Mr. Elliott Woods. Mr. Woods, as we all know, is one of the most efficient men that there is up here on Capitol Hill. He has to do with the management of the Capitol Building and Grounds. No man has a higher regard for Mr. Woods than I have.

If this police force is to be reorganized, it seems to me that the committee should have taken the action necessary before they reported this bill to the House. I do not know whether this force ought to be brought under the control of Mr. Woods or not, but the police force as now constituted is under one head—a captain. I do not know who he is. It may not be a good thing to have the responsibility of the management of this police force divided between three persons, but I think before the House takes action of this kind it ought to be studied out, and there ought to be a properly prepared amendment, and that no one ought to undertake to offer an amendment here, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] has done, who is a member of the committee, and had a long time to study this proposition. I think the provision offered by the gentleman from Iowa is subject to the point of order.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The law authorizing the appointment of this force provides—

There shall be a captain of police, the member of which shall be appointed by the Sergeants at Arms of the two Houses and the architect of the Capitol Extension. There shall be a captain of the Capitol police and such other members with such rates of compensation, respectively, as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year.

It seems to me it is clearly subject to a point of order. Do I understand the gentleman to make it?

Mr. FOSTER. I will make the point of order; but let me say before I do so that I am not averse to any proper arrangement, but I believe we ought to have it done in the right way. If there is to be a reorganization, I shall not object to it; but I do not believe we ought to adopt this amendment at this time and in this way. If the gentleman wishes to draw a provision placing the police force of the Capitol all under one head, I should not object to such a provision if properly worked out. I make a point of order on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. GOOD. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Speaker: Secretary to Speaker, $4,000; clerk to Speaker's table, $3,600, and for preparing Digest of the Rules, $1,000 per annum; clerk to Speaker, $1,600; messenger to Speaker, $1,440; messenger to Speaker's table, $1,200; in all, $12,840.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the gentleman in charge of the bill a question. We have had a rather strenuous week. I wonder how late he expects to continue with this measure today?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I had hoped that the committee would be willing to sit patiently in session until 5 o'clock. The gentleman is aware of the fact that very liberal time was extended in general debate, and we have not had much opportunity to read the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Clerk: Clerk of the House of Representatives, including compensation as disbursing officer of the contingent fund, $6,500; hire of horse and wagon for use of the Clerk's office, $900, or so much thereof as may be necessary; chief clerk, $4,500; journal clerk, and two reading clerks, at $4,000 each; disbursing clerk, $3,400; tally clerk, $3,300; file clerk, $3,250; enrolling clerk, $3,000 and $1,000 additional so long as the position is held by the present incumbent; chief bill clerk, $3,000; assistant to chief clerk, and assistant enrolling clerk, at $2,500 each; assistant to disbursing clerk, $2,400; stationery clerk, $2,200; librarian, $2,100; assistant file clerk, $1,900; two assistant librarians, messenger and assistant Journal clerk, at $1,800 each; clerks—one $1,800, three at $1,680 each; bookkeeper, and assistant in disbursing office, at $1,600 each; four assistants to chief bill clerk, at $1,500 each; stenographer to Clerk, $1,400; locksmith, who shall be skilled in his trade, $1,300; messenger in chief clerk's office, and assistant in stationery room, at $1,200 each; messenger in file room, messenger in disbursing office, and assistant in House library, at $1,100 each; stenographer to chief bill clerk, $1,000; seven telephone operators, at $900 each; three session telephone operators, at $75 per month each from December 1, 1918, to March 31, 1919; substitute telephone operator when required, at $2.50 per day, $500; two laborers in bathroom, at $900 each; six laborers, at $720 each; page in enrolling room, $720; two janitors, at $720 each; allowance to chief clerk for stenographic and typewriter services, $1,000; in all, $102,270.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I notice that this paragraph totals nearly $2,000 more than last year. What increases have been inserted? Have these laborers in the bathroom had their salaries raised?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I may state to the gentleman that the only increases in this paragraph consist of $1,000 additional for the enrolling clerk. The gentleman will notice that the provision reads:

Enrolling clerk $3,000, and $1,000 additional so long as the position is held by the present incumbent.

That was incorporated in this bill because of a House resolution passed heretofore, which is now the law so far as the House is concerned.

Mr. WALSH. I notice that increase.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The other increases are two telephone operators, at $900 each. Those are the increases. The appropriation is reduced from what it would otherwise have been on account of the fact that the next session will be a short session.

Mr. WALSH. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. In lines 19 and 20 there are two laborers for the bathroom, at $900 each. Does that refer to the bathroom in the House Office Building?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I so understand.

Mr. WALSH. How is it that the bathroom in the House Office Building is under the jurisdiction of the Clerk, while the tonsorial parlors are under the jurisdiction of the Doorkeeper?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I really can not tell the gentleman why that is. It has been the custom ever since the House Office Building was erected and first occupied, as I understand. The committee have simply followed the established custom and have continued the appropriation in this manner. I do not know whether it was because originally the Clerk was supposed to have peculiar knowledge and qualifications concerning the duties of a bathroom attendant or not, or whether the Doorkeeper was supposed to have peculiar tonsorial abilities.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. These bathroom laborers were under the Clerk of the House before the House Office Building was erected, when the bathroom was in the Capitol.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS], who has been here a great number of years, longer than the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and myself, has, I think, given a very clear explanation.

Mr. WALSH. They were under the jurisdiction of the Clerk before the House Office Building was erected, in the old days when they not only had bathrooms, but when thirst might be quenched downstairs in the Capitol.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The gentleman says I have been here a long time. I have not been here so long as that. [Laughter.] There was no place where a thirst could be satisfied when I came here.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to know if these two laborers are in the classified service or in the patronage that goes to the party that may be unfortunate enough to be in power?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. One, I understand, has been here 40 years and another 17 years.

Mr. WALSH. I think they are classified. [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question. Where is the provision for the compensation of the Speaker?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is carried on page 12. His salary being fixed by law it is carried in that lump appropriation.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In express terms you provide for the salary a little later for the President, $75,000, and the Vice President, $12,000. Their salaries are fixed by law. Why should the Speaker be omitted and these two salaries mentioned which are fixed by law?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The President is an executive officer and it has been the custom to appropriate his salary in specific terms. It is a matter of custom; this bill could appropriate for each Member individually if it was desired to do so, but this has been the custom.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The salary of the President is fixed by law and so is that of the Vice President.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will pardon me, let me say that the Vice President is not a Member of the Senate, while the Speaker of the House is a Member of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clerks, messengers, and janitors to the following committees: Accounts—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,800, janitor $1,000; Agriculture—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,800, janitor $1,000; Appropriations—clerk $4,000 and $1,000 additional so long as the position is held by the present incumbent, assistant clerk and stenographer $2,500, assistant clerks—1 $1,900, 1 $1,800, janitor $1,000; Banking and Currency—clerk $2,000, assistant clerk $1,200, janitor $720; Census—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Claims—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,200, janitor $720; Coinage, Weights, and Measures—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; District of Columbia—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,800, janitor $720; Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress—clerk $2,000; Elections No. 1—clerk $2,000, janitor $1,000; Elections No. 2—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Elections No. 3—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Enrolled bills—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Flood Control—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Foreign Affairs—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,800, janitor $720; Immigration and Naturalization—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Indian Affairs—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,800, janitor $720; Industrial Arts and Expositions—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Insular Affairs—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Interstate and Foreign Commerce—clerk $2,500, additional clerk $2,000, assistant clerk $1,500, janitor $1,000; Irrigation of Arid Lands—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Invalid Pensions—clerk $2,500, stenographer $2,190, assistant clerk $2,000, janitor $1,000; Judiciary—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,600, janitor $720; Labor—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Library—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Merchant Marine and Fisheries—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Military Affairs—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,500, janitor $1,000; Mines and Mining—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Naval Affairs—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,500, janitor $1,000; Patents—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Pensions—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,600, janitor $720; Post Offices and Post Roads—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,400, janitor $1,000; Printing—clerk $2,000, janitor $1,000; Public Buildings and Grounds—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,200, janitor $720; Public Lands—clerk $2,000, assistant clerk $1,200, janitor $720; Revision of the Laws—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Rivers and Harbors—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,800, janitor $1,000; Roads—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Rules—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; Territories—clerk $2,000, janitor $720; War Claims—clerk $2,500, assistant clerk $1,200, janitor $720; Ways and Means—clerk $3,000, assistant clerk and stenographer $2,000, assistant clerk $1,900, janitors—1 $1,000, 1 $720; in all, $171,790.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to make a few observations in reference to some of the inequalities, apparently, in the treatment of compensation that is paid to the assistants for these various committees. I desire to direct the attention of the committee to one very important committee which has been able to struggle along without a janitor, and I congratulate the distinguished chairman of that committee, the gentleman from Missouri [Judge RUCKER], the Committee on Election of President and Vice President, in being able to get along with simply a single clerk. And I wonder how it is that the great and extremely busy Committee on Elections No. 1 requires a clerk at $2,000, a janitor at $1,000, when the equally distinguished and busy Committee on Elections No. 2 gets along with a clerk at $2,000 and a janitor at $720.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I notice that there are only one or two cases where a janitor gets $1,000; most of the others get $720.

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know why the particular service in these two places are so much more valuable than the other places.

Mr. WALSH. That had occurred to me in making these observations. I wondered why it was that the janitor of the Committee on Printing received $1,000 and the Committee on Invalid Pensions has a clerk at $2,500, a stenographer at $2,190, an assistant clerk at $2,000, and a janitor at $1,000, while the Committee on War Claims, which has not been very active during this Congress, is given a clerk at $2,500, an assistant clerk at $2,200, and a janitor at $720.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that when the Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on Naval Affairs can get along with a clerk at $2,500, an assistant at $1,500, and a janitor, that these other committees, which especially during the war session have not been very active, can get along with less help. This Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on Naval Affairs have had some measures of the greatest importance, and yet we provide them in this bill—I do not know whether there are any special resolutions or not—for less assistance than we do to some other committees that have had much less to do. I suppose there must be some reason for it.

Mr. MADDEN. Has the gentleman noticed that the important Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions has a clerk at $2,000 and a janitor at $750? How many expositions have there been for the last year or so?

Mr. WALSH. I do not know of any expositions which have been held in the country as a result of legislation initiated by this committee within the last year or so.

Mr. MADDEN. I should think that this clerk would be overworked, and I am sure that the janitor must be. Some day, if the committee should by chance have a meeting, I suppose they will bring in a bill for extra compensation.

Mr. WALSH. Either that or for services of a doctor. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill further, in all seriousness, whether this is a matter that is taken as a matter of course each year, or whether any attempt is made in framing the bill to ascertain whether the services are needed or whether it is necessary to have these assistants that have heretofore been provided for.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that the committee never investigates the necessity of the employment of these clerks and assistant clerks and janitors to committees, for the reason that they are already provided for by House resolution. The committee therefore feels that it has no discretion, in view of the action of the House taken by resolution, to fail to make appropriation for their salaries.

Some committees have stated that they do not have sufficient help and we have informed them that the proper way to secure it was by a resolution formally introduced in the House, so that it could go to the Committee on Accounts and be taken up in the regular way.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WALSH. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman mean that if way back in 1897 Congress appropriated for an employee for some of these committees the Appropriations Committee would from year to year continue the appropriations?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; not if the Appropriations Committee was convinced that the services of an employee in any department of the House was not necessary to be continued. In such case it would call the attention of the House to it and the House could take such action as it pleased. But I assume that the committees are as busy to-day as they were in 1897. The work of the committees of the House has grown tremendously, and it is certainly a safe assumption to say that if clerks were necessary in 1897 they are necessary now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I notice that the Committee on Roads has a clerk at $2,000 per annum and a janitor at $720 per annum. This committee has not been a very active one during this session, yet during the last Congress it was one of the important committees of the House and did a great deal of work. I have the honor to serve on that great committee.

Mr. MADDEN. Did the gentleman say "serve"?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman mean that he is a member of that committee?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am a member of that committee. But there has not been a meeting of our committee now for sometime.

Mr. DYER. That clerk must be overworked.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course, I am at loss to know what the duties of the clerk and the janitor of that committee are at this time.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am sure the gentleman ought to know more about the duties of the clerk and the janitor to his committee than the gentleman who is in charge of this bill. Has the gentleman any idea that there would be objection to a motion to eliminate the clerk and janitor of this committee?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no; I would not object. I do not know what the chairman of the committee thinks about it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, let us try. I move to amend on page 15, line 24, by striking out the provision for the clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, line 24, strike out, after the word "roads," the words "clerk, $2,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ROBBINS) there were—ayes 3, noes 33.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I beg the indulgence of the House while I recur to a suggestion I made a moment ago and the reply that was made to it by the chairman of the committee and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. I called attention to the fact that on page 29 there is this provision:

For compensation of the President of the United States, $75,000.
For compensation of the Vice President of the United States, $12,000—

And that there is no similar provision in express terms for the compensation to the Speaker. Thereupon the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] rose and said that the reason that there was an express provision for the Vice President was that the Vice President is not a Member of the Senate, whereas the Speaker is a Member of the House. That, however, is merely the custom—that the Speaker is a Member of the House. The House could elect anybody not a Member of the House as its Speaker at any time. It could, in its discretion, depose the present Speaker and elect another who is an entire outsider, and if that should happen this provision would not be applicable at all.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In a moment. Then this provision would not be applicable to the next House of Representatives until it shall have chosen a Member of the House as its Speaker, and in strict accuracy the language ought to be changed. I do not desire to be hypercritical about it, but my suggestion was well founded, because the next Speaker of the House of Representatives may not be a Member of the House of Representatives.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. FESS. By what authority does the gentleman say that this House could elect some one its Speaker who is not a Member of the House?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Because the Constitution provides simply that the House of Representatives shall elect a Speaker, and we could elect a Speaker who is not a Member of the House, exactly as does the House of Commons in England.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment, to make the observation that I do not believe that that statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] that the House could elect as its Speaker one who is not a Member of the House.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit one interruption right there, so that I may call his attention to the language of the Constitution, for then he may not wish to continue his statement.

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The Constitution reads:

The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers.

The words "and other officers" have uniformly been held to mean that they could in their discretion elect anyone a Speaker who is not a Member of the House, just as they choose their officers from gentlemen who are not Members of the House.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, simply because there has not been a Speaker elected who was not a Member of the House would not, of course, be conclusive that it could not be done.

Therefore I do not offer that as an argument that it could not have been, but the language employed, read by the gentleman from Wisconsin, is not to be interpreted, I take it, that the membership of this House could go beyond its membership to select its chief officer, because under the rules of the House the Speaker of the House can vote on every measure whether his vote will change the result or not. Now, in the Senate the presiding officer can not vote on every measure, but only in case of a tie, but in this House the presiding officer can vote on every measure. Now, in case that he was not a Member of this House he certainly could not vote on any measure.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I do.

Mr. MADDEN. I thought perhaps the gentleman from Wisconsin might have it in his mind the danger of the House electing the Secretary of the Treasury to another job. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. That is a very pertinent observation.

Mr. GARNER. It occurs to me the gentleman from Wisconsin is absolutely correct in the construction of the Constitution, and I do not see where the point that the gentleman from Ohio makes is tenable here because the rules are made after the Speaker has been elected and the House is organized, and it is only by virtue of the rules that the Speaker is permitted to vote. I will illustrate. Suppose we come in here and elect some distinguished gentleman, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, Speaker of the House and made no change of the rules providing that he could not vote; he would still be Speaker of the House and would not violate the Constitution.

Mr. HAMLIN. If the gentleman will permit a suggestion, I think the gentleman from Texas is wrong in his premises. The Speaker of the House is permitted to vote by virtue of the fact that he is a Member of the House, and the House would not be authorized to take from him that privilege because he is a Member of the House.

Mr. FESS. That would be my interpretation of it.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is unquestionably and undoubtedly so.

Mr. FESS. I think the observation made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] a while ago was well made and is the real explanation of putting it in a lump sum in one case and setting out the Vice President in the other.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Doorkeeper: Doorkeeper, $5,000; maintenance and repair of folding room motor truck, $500, or so much thereof as may be necessary; special employee, $1,500; superintendent of reporters' gallery, $1,600; janitor, $1,500; messengers—16 at $1,180 each, 14 on soldiers' roll at $1,200 each; laborers—17 at $720 each, 2 known as cloakroom men at $840 each, 8 known as cloakroom men, 1 $600 and 1 $120 additional so long as the position is held by the present incumbent, and 7 at $600 each; 2 female attendants in ladies' retiring rooms at $800 each; superintendent of folding room, $2,500; foreman, $1,800; 3 clerks, at $1,600 each; messenger, $1,200; janitor, $720; laborer, $720; 32 folders, at $900 each; 2 drivers, at $840 each; 2 chief pages, at $1,200 each; 2 messengers in charge of telephones (1 for the minority), at $1,500 each; 46 pages, during the session, including 2 riding pages, 4 telephone pages, press-gallery page, and 10 pages for duty at the entrances to the Hall of the House, at $2.50 per day each, $13,800; superintendent of document room, $2,900; assistant superintendent, $2,100; clerk, $1,700; assistant clerk, $1,600; assistants—7 at $1,280 each, 1 $1,100; janitor, $920; messenger to press room, $1,000; in all, $147,920.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I may not be quite in order in this place in what I wish to say, but I thought, while we were here close to the paragraph for employees of the Office Building, that it would not be amiss to call attention to the fact that in my room they have only washed the windows once since this session began and only furnish towels every other day, and the rest of the time we have not got any, and no attempt is being made to keep the rooms clean. If the kind of janitor service which we are receiving there was rendered in a private office building there would be a good deal of a row about it. There is not any reason why we should not have the offices kept clean, there is no reason why the windows should not be washed, there is no reason why towels should not be supplied and soap. It may be that some people do not care to wash, but I do once in a while.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Does not the gentleman think cobwebs ought to be removed once in a while?

Mr. MADDEN. I think we ought to have a real janitor service. We have got enough people on the pay roll to give the service.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I just wondered if the gentleman had called the attention of the commission which has charge of the House Office Building to this.

Mr. MADDEN. No; I have not. I do not think it is necessary for me to get down on my knees to the man in charge of the building to get service. We ought to have it without appealing to him.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I was not referring to the superintendent of the building.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not want to be put in the attitude of asking favors from the man in charge of the building.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The point of my inquiry, if the gentleman will pardon me, was this: The commission, which the gentleman knows consists of three distinguished Members of this House, no doubt is not acquainted with the facts the gentleman has stated, and I am sure they would be very glad to have the gentleman give them this information.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know the membership of the commission——

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Will the gentleman yield for a second? I suggest this, that if the gentleman makes a complaint to the House Office Building commission or any member thereof he will have to leave the House Office Building in order to find those Members, because no one of the Members has his office in the House Office Building itself, strange as it may appear.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, the men who are acting as commissioners for the building are a favored set.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. No; I understand it is the statute. The statute was framed, undoubtedly, without due consideration of the fact that the Speaker, who is a member of it, has his room in the Capitol; that the minority leader has his room in the Capitol; and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has his room in the Capitol. So it finally results that the three gentlemen charged with the administration of the House Office Building have their offices in the Capitol.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, they do not understand the importance of having clean rooms in the other building. They do not visit the building at all and do not understand the situation.

And I wish to call attention also while I am on my feet to the fact that the elevator service over there is very poor, and the elevator men do not give much attention. I do not want to complain about the men if I can help it, but I am complaining about the system, and there is no regulation requiring them to give respectful consideration to those who ride upon the elevators. They s oke when ladies are on the elevators, which ought not to be allowed. They come when they please. If you are on the second floor and you ring for them to come, they pass you by frequently without waiting to find whether you want to go up or down. They do not know whether you are a Member of Congress or not, and do not care.

Mr. COX. Can the gentleman tell why during the rush hour, when we quit here at night, that nine times out of ten there is but one elevator there, and we have to stay down in the basement and wait for an elevator? And at the noon hour it is the same way.

Mr. MADDEN. We have 14 elevator men over there, and I think only six elevators. I think if we have 14 men we ought to have sufficient elevators to keep them employed.

Mr. COX. They ought to work.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what I say.

Mr. ROBBINS. My experience over there is that they have gone into my offices and taken out the hair brushes and——

Mr. MADDEN. You would not say that about the elevator force.

Mr. ROBBINS. I say that about the janitor force.

Mr. MADDEN. All I can say is that when I leave here I take everything of any value and lock it up, and no matter how hard it is locked up, when I come back it is gone.

Mr. PURNELL. Will the gentleman kindly pay his respects to the cockroaches while he is on his feet?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not associate with them. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important item, and of course the criticisms that have been made are also very important, and I think are of vital interest to the Members, in view of the present emergency, and I think we ought to have a larger attendance in order to discuss this matter. I do not want to hasten the gentleman from Tennessee unduly, but I do make the point of no quorum.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will not the gentleman from Massachusetts allow us to get down to the bottom of the next page?

Mr. WALSH. I have a great many inquiries that I wish to make in reference to this item, and I do not think we can do that before 5 o'clock.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Of course, if the gentleman insists I will yield to him and move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10358) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, pursuant to the order previously made, until to-morrow, Sunday, March 3, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of War, submitting a proposed clause of legislation for inclusion in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919 (H. Doc. No. 963), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Also, petition of the council of the city of Pittsburgh, Pa., urging the provision of necessary money for the early completion of the improvements of the Ohio River, and also for the enactment of legislation providing for the immediate construction by the Government of the Lake Erie and Ohio River Canal; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, March 3, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by Mr. TILSON, as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite Spirit, our Heavenly Father, we bless Thee for the faith that holds our course to Thee; for the hope that cheers us on our way; for the love that reflects itself from a thousand angles in crystallized thought and acts, in deeds of kindness and generosity, in the sacrifices around the fireside which pour themselves out in motherly solicitude and fatherly care, in the heroism for the principles we love, and in the glory of the holy sacrifices on the field of battle; for these angels enthroned in the heart of man; the wireless telegraphy that keeps us in touch with Thee.

We are here to-day in memory of a statesman who has finished the work Thou didst give him to do for his constitutents, State, and Nation. Strong in his conceptions, pure in his motives, firm in his convictions, he leaves behind him a record worthy of a place on the pages of history.

Comfort his colleagues, friends, and those who were near to him in the ties of love; and bring us all, in Thine own good time, to dwell together with the faithful in Him who taught us life, liberty, truth, justice, mercy; and everlasting praise be Thine. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the Journal.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE HILL OF CONNECTICUT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the special order.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. MERRITT, by unanimous consent,

Ordered, That Sunday, March 3, 1918, be set apart for addresses upon the life, character, and public services of Hon. EBENEZER J. HILL, late a Representative from the State of Connecticut.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Connecticut offers a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 263.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. EBENEZER J. HILL, late a Member of this House from the State of Connecticut.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House at the conclusion of these exercises, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, it is hard for me to appreciate that I speak here not merely as Mr. HILL'S friend and constituent but as his successor. He had for so many years and so adequately represented the district that he had become an institution, and, I may add, an institution which the district and the country could ill afford to lose. The district regarded him with confidence in his honesty and wisdom, and those who knew him, with affection, also. While it is true that he was a strong party man, it is true, also, that he regarded all individuals and all interests in his district as under his care, and they received it, Democrats and Republicans alike, so that after election was over all parties regarded him as their Representative and he accepted the trust in that broad way. He had a peculiar right to represent Fairfield County. There have been in this country no hereditary titles or privileges, but fortunately there are some families with hereditary ability and character. The Hill family is one of these, and its paternal ancestors have been residents in Fairfield County from its earliest settlement. Andrew Ward, the only man appointed by the Colony of Massachusetts on both its Committee of the Church and Committee of the State to organize the Colony of Connecticut, was an ancestor.

William Hill, the first Hill ancestor in America, was a member of the first colonial Connecticut Legislature, at Hartford, and so continued until his death.

Two hundred and fifty years later his descendant, EBENEZER J. HILL, was a member of that same legislature, by that time, however, the legislature of a sovereign State.

During that interval of two hundred and fifty years there was no time when members of the family were not serving the church and state.

The Rev. John Jones, of Concord, Mass., the first minister of the town of Fairfield, was an ancestor, and was publicly recognized as active in forwarding the interests of the colony.

Many other persons prominent in the county history from colonial times down to the present are among his ancestors.

And a study of this ancestry shows also how and why he was among the earliest to form and avow the conviction that women should have equal rights and opportunities with men.

Mr. HILL'S own mother was the wife of a minister of Hartford, and when her husband was ill for some weeks she conducted the services to the satisfaction of the congregation. His grandfather Hill was one of the early Methodists in Connecticut and was also a leading abolitionist and suffered considerable persecution on that account.

His maternal ancestors were Scotch and came to Portland, Me., then called Falmouth and under the jurisdiction of the Colony of Massachusetts.

These ancestors were of the same sort, and, being nearer the frontier, took even a more active part in the Indian and colonial wars.

Pacifists were at that period neither popular nor numerous, and if there were any slackers they were not in the Hill ancestry.

Time will not permit to follow this inquiry over the seas, but it is of interest to note that the wife of the first Hill in America was the daughter of Ignatius Jourdain, who was deputy mayor of Exeter, in England; and he, during a plague, when the mayor had fled, remained at his post and did almost superhuman relief work. Later he was summoned before the star chamber under the Stuarts for refusing to yield his religious convictions.

And so, to represent this line of God-fearing and man-serving people, EBENEZER J. HILL was born in Redding, Conn., in 1845.

This lineage and this background were a precious inheritance and a strong incentive, and well did he profit from the first and respond to the second.

His ability and industry were early shown by the fact that he passed his entrance examination for Yale at the age of 14, but owing to the regulations he could not enter until 1861, in the class of 1865.

The young men of that time, like our young men now, felt the call of country, and in his sophomore year, 1863, he tried to enlist, but was still too young, so he took the only opening that presented itself and entered in the Quartermaster's Department as assistant to his brother, Maj. Asbury Hill, and there remained until the end of the war.

He did not complete his undergraduate course, but in 1895 Yale conferred upon him the degree of A. M. in recognition of his public services.

Upon reentering civil life after the war he at once went into active business, not neglecting his public duties and responsibilities.

To indicate his varied activity it may be mentioned that for 25 years and until he was elected to Congress he was in the lumber business; and also, at different times, he was president of the Norwalk Street Railway Co., Norwalk Gas Light Co., Norwalk Mills Co., and later vice president and then president of the National Bank of Norwalk, which office he held at the time of his death.

During this period he was active in performing his duties as a citizen in the town and borough of Norwalk, serving as a member of the city government and also upon the board of school visitors.

In 1884 he was a delegate to the Republican national convention at Chicago, which nominated James G. Blaine; and in 1886 he was elected a member of the Connecticut State Senate, and some valuable constructive legislation was credited to him at that time.

In 1894 he was elected to the Fifty-fourth Congress, and began that service which lasted, with the exception of a single Congress, the Sixty-third, until his death, in 1917.

This period of service in the House, consisting of more than 20 years, was longer by over two years than that of any man who had previously represented Connecticut.

His ability and industry early gave him a standing in the House which time and experience confirmed and strengthened. Aside from other committee work, he served for 8 years on the Banking and Currency Committee and 14 years on the Ways and Means Committee. Of his work on those committees and in Congress his colleagues here present can speak with more intimate knowledge and greater authority than I. We in his district, however, had good reason to know of his untiring devotion to his work, his constant study of economic conditions, especially with regard to manufactures in this country and abroad, and his wonderful accumulation of facts, which was indeed encyclopedic.

In his later years he had a deserved national reputation as an authority on matters of the tariff and banking. In addition to his studies he added to his store of knowledge by wide travel and careful and accurate observation. Scarcely a vacation passed without his going to some foreign land for pleasure and study combined, and he always added to his store of useful information.

I say useful advisedly, because he was no collector of dry facts but rather of facts as tools for use.

He cared for this knowledge not as a historian but as a forward-looking statesman. This is shown by the fact that he not merely helped on good measures, but he either originated or was among the pioneers in legislation which was now and has been most beneficial in this country.

He had a leading part in establishing the gold standard, his speech in Congress on that subject being used throughout the United States as a textbook and authority. To his credit largely are to be placed the establishment of rural free delivery, his own district being the second district in which rural free delivery was established; free alcohol for the arts; and the chemical schedule in the present tariff bill, which promises to establish the dyestuff industry in this country.

He was also an ardent supporter of national enfranchisement of women—and this years before it became a political issue or even popular. Indeed, he stood on this platform in the face of threats that it might imperil his renomination. He was prominent in the Methodist Church and in the order of Odd Fellows.

And with all this tremendous activity and diversity of interest and occupation he had a fine capacity for friendship and good fellowship.

There was no town in his district where he had not hosts of friends; no assembly where he was not welcome nor where his coming did not add to its pleasure. To illustrate one phase of his character which did not always appear on the surface, may I give one personal anecdote?

Among his friends was a Catholic priest, Father Furlong, of Norwalk. Before his trip to the Holy Land Mr. HILL called on his friend, then sick unto death, and asked him if there was anything he could bring him. Said the father, "If I live so long I should like, above all things, to have you bring me a rosary from the Holy City." When Mr. HILL was in the Garden of Gethsemane, which was under the care of monks of the Franciscan order, he noted an old olive tree said to have been there since the days of our Lord. In conversation with the abbot he learned that the olive stones were carefully preserved and made into rosaries, but were reserved strictly for the members of the order and never sold. Thereupon Mr. HILL told the abbot the story of his dying friend, the priest in Norwalk, and what a solace and inspiration this rosary coming from this particular place and made by the monks of his order would be to this dying man. The abbot was touched by the story and said that he felt justified in breaking the rule, and presented Mr. HILL with this rosary, which, fortunately, he was able to place in the hands of his friend before he died; and when he died this rosary was clasped in his hand.

Mr. HILL's high devotion to duty never left him. Although he was too ill, he made a special trip to Washington last July in order to speak on an important pending measure. On the 25th of July he made a brilliant speech in the House that attracted the attention both of the House and the country. Then he went home, and on the very next day, though suffering from exhaustion and overwork, he went to the station to join in the farewell to the boys of the Sixth Company of Coast Artillery, of which his own nephew, Albert Mossman, is captain. He spoke inspiringly to those young men, pointing out to them that they were not going out for conquest, but for the fulfillment of a patriotic duty, and then called on those remaining at home to fulfill their duty in the maintenance of democracy in its best form.

That was his last public appearance, and from then until the 27th day of September, 1917, when he died, he grew steadily weaker, until his splendid constitution was worn out, although his mind remained clear and alert until the last. And I think we can say of him that he, like his friend the priest, died clasping to his heart his rosary of public duty.

Gentlemen, this seems to me a record of a happy and well-spent life. President Eliot has said that the only real happiness is in doing some good thing well. Our friend did many good things in the service of his town, his State, his country, and his fellow men; and he did them all well.

We can readily believe that he has heard the Master say "Well done, thou good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I served several years with our lamented friend, EBENEZER J. HILL, on the great Committee on Ways and Means, long service on which is, within itself, a liberal education. First and last, strong men of almost all occupations or professions testify or argue before it—in fact, every class of men except fools. So far as I know, they never appeared before that committee. Mr. HILL was a working member of both the committee and the House. He was one of the most industrious of mortals, and by constant toil he accumulated a vast quantity of information on a variety of subjects—particularly on economic subjects, on which he was an expert.

One of my college professors frequently said that some people had memories like a tar bucket, to which everything that touched it stuck. Certainly Mr. HILL's memory was of that variety. Consequently he probably possessed as much information as any other man in the House.

He was not an orator, but a forceful speaker—a crack debater. He was exceedingly tenacious of his opinions, advocating and defending them with energy—indeed, with vehemence. He enjoyed a mental and linguistic contest, and when he thought he had the best of a clash the evidences of his pleasure were patent to all observers.

A staunch Republican partisan, he was a thoroughgoing American, fighting for his country in his youth, serving her faithfully in his mature years in this great arena of intellectual struggles.

He was a seasoned traveler, and illumined his speeches and his conversation with facts and illustrations garnered in foreign lands—always to the edification of his hearers.

He was an intense protectionist, but he never fell out with men of different views or underrated their capacity.

He was an agreeable companion and estimated highly the value of friendship.

His death was a positive loss to this House, to his State, and to the country.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, when I first met Mr. HILL, back in the Fifty-seventh Congress, his fourth term and my first, he impressed me as a most forceful character and a most courteous and considerate gentleman. In my 15 years of service with him here I never saw anything to impair, but everything to strengthen that impression. For more than a decade preceding his death HILL was a commanding figure in the House. His intellect, his integrity, his courage, his sense of right and truth, his diligent study of legislation, his courteous deportment, his sympathetic impulses combined to qualify him as such. And he looked the part.

If we except the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the incomparable minority leader, I doubt if any man in Congress in the last 15 years was as tireless a worker or as diligent a student of legislation as he. While well informed on every subject of legislation, he was more of an expert on questions of finance and the tariff. I doubt if the late Mr. PAYNE in his best day had more accurate information with respect to the tariff or gave to it closer study that had Mr. HILL.

I remember hearing Speaker CLARK say once that Mr. Payne knew more about the tariff than any living man. In the Sixty-second Congress, when the House under Democratic control was attempting to revise the tariff, schedule by schedule, I regarded Mr. HILL the most aggressive, the most agile, and the most dangerous opponent of the several revision measures. Frequently I was struck with amazement at the fund of information, and the accuracy of it, he displayed on this floor. He was a splendid debater, with a keen, penetrating mind. He saw at once the weak and strong points of every question, argument, or position. He was a factor to be reckoned with in every contest. His logic and arguments seemed convincing. He was never rhetorical. He expressed his thoughts with emphatic clearness. His delivery was earnest and forceful and oftentimes picturesque. At times he rushed on his opponent like a whirlwind. In the fiercest combat he never gave offense but remained civil and courteous throughout. He was a foeman worthy of the best steel. He was a hard hitter but never an unfair one. He struck always in the open. He and I had many a lively tilt, both on the floor and in the Ways and Means Committee, of which, for many years, he was a leading member. We have given and taken many hard blows, but they never left a sore spot on either. I admired him and held him in the highest esteem. I am happy in the belief that we enjoyed one another's confidence and friendship.

He frequently visited my office, especially in the Sixty-fourth Congress. The last time he visited the Capitol we spent together in my office an hour of most pleasant conference. He was then a sick man, but his mind was as vigorous as ever. He was then keenly interested in and anxious over coming legislation. I never saw him, well or sick, that his eagle eye and nose did not reveal the fighter. I observed it with admiration on this last occasion. As the gentleman from Connecticut, his honorable successor, indicated in his interesting and splendid address, he came from a race of fighters. Yet he was as genial and sweet-spirited and lovable a gentleman as one cares to meet. He was of unimpeachable character. I never heard the slightest reflection cast upon him. The breath of the faintest suspicion never blew about him. He led a clean, pure, open life, both private and public. He was a Christian gentleman in the truest sense. The State and the district, which he served so long, so faithfully, so ably, were most fortunate in having such a man to represent them at the Nation's Capital.

His loved ones who mourn his death have full right and reason to be proud of his career and of his name. The House in honoring to-day the memory of one so worthy does honor to itself. The opportunity extended me by his distinguished successor to speak these simple words of appraisement of our deceased friend and comrade I count as a real privilege, as it is a genuine happiness.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I was shocked and inexpressibly saddened when I learned of the death of Mr. HILL. Of course, I knew that he had been ill, like myself. We had mutually advised each other to cut out work and rest.

Mr. HILL was a real statesman. He became a recognized authority, particularly upon economic problems, and especially upon finance, and under that on banking currency and the tariff.

When I became the Republican leader in the House I often turned to Mr. HILL for advice and information. I had a number of sessions with him, and his remarkable fund of information was very striking. He was one of the most intense characters that I have ever met. I used to wonder sometimes, in the House, when Mr. HILL was in debate, with that fiery earnestness and intensity, with his hand and finger pointed as though his words would burn—I used to wonder sometimes, looking at him, whether he would come down to earth again. Then would come that genial smile following the intense argument, showing that his feet were on the ground all the time. I never saw him when he was so intense that he could not be a good-natured, smiling, sweet-tempered gentleman.

If it were not for my own condition I should be glad to speak longer. This is the first time, Mr. Speaker, that I have spoken in the House since toward the middle of last July, and it was only because of my intense admiration and affection for Mr. HILL that I felt obliged to-day to satisfy myself in making these few remarks in memory of one of the great men of the House, a distinct loss to the House and to the country, and also my particular friend.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, every great country recognizes and honors its great men. To-day we meet to honor the memory of a veteran Member, who for more than a score of years stood among the foremost in the framing of legislation. Almost from the first he was known as a strong, fearless, able, and intelligent advocate of all that tends to make us great and keep us free. He came here an accomplished, energetic, successful man of affairs, and in all matters pertaining to business, revenue, and finance his advice was early recognized as wise, conscientious, and sound. In the days when Payne of New York, Dalzell of Pennsylvania, Grosvenor of Ohio, and Boutell of Illinois were often spoken of as the big four of the Republican side, it would have been hard to say that HILL of Connecticut was not just as much entitled to membership in the leading quartet.

He represented an element of which there is always too small a representation in Congress—the constructive, successful man of affairs. In its hours of ease the Congress has been prone to bait and belittle the men of this country who organize and finance its business, and to imagine that in some way the lawyer and politician can run things; but after doing a great deal to hamper and handicap the men who accomplish results, the recent months of stress and peril have seen the Government turn its appealing hands to these men as the hope of the country. And they are.

MR. HILL came here at the opening of the Fifty-fourth Congress, on the first Monday in December, 1895. Of the Members who outranked him in length of service only six remain with us—JOSEPH G. CANNON, of Illinois, with 21 terms to his credit; WILLIAM A. JONES, of Virginia, 14 terms; HENRY ALLEN COOPER, of Wisconsin, and FREDERICK H. GILLETT, of Massachusetts, 13 terms; CHAMP CLARK, of Missouri, and J. FRED TALBOTT, of Maryland, 12 terms each. GEORGE EDMUND FOSS, of Illinois, FRANK W. MONDELL, of Wyoming, and RICHARD WAYNE PARKER, of New Jersey, each with 11 terms of service, first came to this House in the same Congress, and stood before the Speaker's desk to receive the oath of office at the same time as Mr. HILL. Two Members of shorter service, CHARLES R. CRISP, of Georgia, and BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD, of New York, also served in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

A glance at Mr. HILL's early speeches will show that from the very start he showed that broad, piercing vision that always is found in the statesman and the man of large affairs. The very first speech that he delivered, on February 11, 1896, reads almost like a prophecy. He said that the issues were three: First, adequate revenue, based on protection lines, to fully meet expenses, reduce to some extent the national debt and develop the resources of the Nation; second, a sound system of national finance, and give the business interests of the country peace; third—and could he have said it better if he had been speaking today—we must maintain the honor and protect the rights of the American people everywhere, abroad as well as at home, and give sympathy, encouragement, and hope to men who are fighting for freedom in other lands.

Throughout his whole membership here he was always the champion of the rights and prerogatives of the House, and his very last utterance on this floor was on July 25, 1917, when he rose to a question of privilege and, as a member of the Ways and Means Committee, called attention to the fact that he thought the privileges of the House were being invaded by the action of the Senate in proposing to raise money by certificates of indebtedness, the function of this House to originate. He said the Republican Members of the House proposed to stand by the administration, but they wanted to do it "legally, fairly, and squarely." Legally, fairly, and squarely! That was the way Mr. HILL always did things. He was manly, straightforward, direct, affirmative, constructive—an American of whom his associates, his State, and his country are proud.

Mr. HILL's two great specialties in legislation were our financial system and the tariff. In matters relating to banking and currency he possessed a practical knowledge and a breadth of vision rarely equaled and never surpassed by any Member within this generation.

He was sent here by a constituency that recognized the value of long service, and so was able to develop his capacity as a legislator, and to give to his district and his country the benefit of the ripe experience that can come only from years of apprenticeship in the business of being a Congressman.

I have said that there were six men of longer service than Mr. HILL remaining in the House and two others who had served as long. It is only a little while ago, and yet, of the great company of 357 men who formed the House of the Fifty-fourth Congress, where are the rest? Some, like Pitney, of New Jersey, and McMillin, of Tennessee, now occupy high posts in other departments of the Government. A few others, like BANKHEAD, of Alabama, CURTIS, of Kansas, SHAFORTH, of Colorado, SMITH, of Michigan, and UNDERWOOD, of Alabama, now hold places of honor in the Senate of the United States. Some are prosperous in private life. But we have held solemn services like these for many of them, and many others have died since their membership here was ended.

In that Congress the Speaker was Thomas B. Reed, of Maine, who was ex-officio chairman of the Committee on Rules. Nelson Dingley, of Maine, was chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. Among the other members of that committee were Sereno E. Payne, of New York; Charles H. Grosvenor, of Ohio; Jonathan P. Dolliver, of Iowa; Charles F. Crisp, of Georgia, ex-Speaker and father of our honored colleague CHARLES R. CRISP. JOSEPH G. CANNON, of Illinois, was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. In his right hand is length of days, in his left hand honor and affection. Long, long, indeed, may he be spared to us and to his country. The chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was William P. Hepburn, of Iowa: on Banking and Currency, Joseph H. Walker, of Massachusetts; on the District of Columbia, Joseph W. Babcock, of Wisconsin; on Education, Galusha A. Grow, of Pennsylvania; on Foreign Affairs, Robert R. Hitt, of Illinois; on Indian Affairs, James S. Sherman, of New York; on Invalid Pensions, John A. Pickler, of South Dakota; on the Judiciary, David B. Henderson, of Iowa; on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, Sereno E. Payne, of New York; on Naval Affairs, Charles A. Boutelle, of Maine; on Pensions, Henry C. Loudenslager, of New Jersey; on the Post Office and Post Roads, Eugene F. Loud, of California; on Public Buildings and Grounds, Seth L. Milliken, of Maine.

On what was then the minority side of the House were Leonidas F. Livingston, of Georgia; Francis G. Newlands, of Nevada; James D. Richardson, of Tennessee; James E. Cobb, of Alabama; David A. De Armond, of Missouri; William H. Crain, of Texas; Hernando D. Money, of Mississippi; Josiah Patterson, of Tennessee; and Henry G. Turner, of Georgia. Scores of others that I might mention call up vivid memories of great debates and great service. As we hear their names their voices echo again in our ears. We see their faces; we recall their hearty handclasps as we greeted them session after session. They make for us a moving picture of friendship, of character, of manly strength. Yesterday they were with us. Now the calling of the roll of their names is answered only by silence and our own heartache. Our Members fall like soldiers. And, Mr. Speaker, what a scene of struggle this Hall has been. The issues for which the men of 22 years ago were fighting here have many of them gone. Then Grover Cleveland was in his second term, and the country was divided on the question of the free and unlimited coinage of silver. Since then the legislative pendulum has swung both ways on the tariff question. Government operation of utilities, the efficient coordination of all business activities, the development to the utmost of national resources, the conservation of food and fuel, the quick development of a great merchant fleet, these and the other paramount questions now under discussion were unborn and unknown subjects in legislative halls. The great roll of missing men, as well as the new subjects that we must discuss and settle as best we can, serve to remind us of the thought so eloquently expressed long ago by Edmund Burke, when, on hearing of the death of his opponent for a seat in Parliament, he exclaimed, "What shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue!"

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, we call the flower of American manhood for the purposes of war. The aged we leave behind for counsel. The infirm, the halt, the unfit, we do not take. It is one of the curious inconsistencies of our times that when the sound of battle calls we send forward to the supreme test the best we have and leave behind, even as a burden or a menace, much that the body politic might well dispense with; but this is the soldier's way.

If we go into the orchard when the fruit is ripening, we take not the gnarled and unfit fruit. We leave it to sap the strength of the tree, possibly, and take that fruit only which is wholesome, that which is rosy-red. When we enter the garden we do not pluck the thistles and the thorns nor the rose that is shedding its bloom. We pick that flower which is purest and fairest.

Sometimes I think it is so with men in private and in public life. We yield up those who have been most serviceable, those who are most capable by experience and learning to sustain our aims. Strange, is it not, that when one has perfected himself for public work and has acquired such knowledge and information as has been accurately attributed to our lamented colleague, Mr. HILL, that we should suddenly be bereft of his association and services? But this surely is not our way; it is God's way, and we may neither question nor resist it.

EBENEZER J. HILL, as has been so eloquently stated by the distinguished leader of the majority [Mr. KITCHIN] and by our beloved minority leader [Mr. MANN], was of statesman stature. He was a strong legislator. The foundation was in him. He had grown step by step, through the influences that environed him yonder at Norwalk and throughout Connecticut, until he was the peer of those with whom he came in contact here.

He had specialized upon economics, upon finance, upon the national revenues. He made these great national topics his special study, but he equipped himself in other ways to match the masters of debate in this House and to bring credit to his State and his country. He was a genius at figures, and he noted the small things, so that he might be able to control the larger ones. Did he give information to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], as indicated in the feeling speech so recently delivered? Yes; because he had studied, because he had investigated, because he had made notes, and was sure of his facts. Passing events of importance did not drift from his memory; he noted and preserved them for such emergencies as might arise. He did not let the incidents of the day pass by so that they might be useless to-morrow. Therein was much of his strength as a debater.

My personal acquaintance with Mr. HILL began about that time when he was a contemporary in this House, with Mr. Payne, Mr. Dalzell, and Mr. FORDNEY on the one side, and with Mr. CLARK, now Speaker, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and Mr. KITCHIN on the other. I came here in the Fifty-ninth Congress when Mr. HILL was in the heyday of his activities. It was my privilege to observe and to follow him in all essentials, for in the larger, broader sense EBENEZER J. HILL stood for the rights of America and the preservation of those rights. He had observed and studied the economic conditions that prevailed elsewhere. He believed in American ideals, and hoped for the perpetuation of all that was superior in American life.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I first became acquainted with Mr. HILL when I entered this House in 1911. As a new Member, my attention was naturally called to him as one of its leaders. I well remember in the early days of my membership seeing him take the floor in the midst of an exciting political conflict to deliver one of those powerful addresses for which he was noted. The impression which he made I shall not easily forget. With all the energy he possessed he struck, without fear or favor, and like some champion of old, whose blows sounded upon his enemy's shield, his voice rang out in challenge to his adversaries. Striding back and forth in front of the rostrum, with gestures as vigorous as his speech, always in attack and never in defense, he seemed the impersonation of a parliamentary debater.

He who rises to eminence in so great a parliamentary body as a House of Representatives selected from a hundred millions of people must possess both ability and industry and one or the other to a marked degree. Nor is that all. The path to that elevation is usually a long and weary road, ascended through struggle and combat, by toil and labor. At rare and long intervals some genius has speedily risen, but often generations pass without any quick and dazzling success. In the few years that I have been in the House I have seen lawyers of rare talent, jurists of high standing, authors of note, scholars of reputation, business men of renown, come, and in many cases go, only to find that a high position here must be established by capacity shown for the new work which they were undertaking.

In truth, the science of legislation is the most comprehensive of all studies. He who would understand it fully must know not only the history of his own country, but the history of all countries. He must be familiar with the development and growth of society, the principles upon which civilization rests, and the lines upon which it must advance. Nor must he be a mere theorist or a dreamer. In no place is a capacity for the practical so much needed. Nowhere is a vision for the future so much desired. The learning of the past, the tendency of the present, the demands of the future, the methods of business, and the toil of labor must be considered. The field is limitless. None can hope to cover it all, and many must content themselves with but a small portion of the ground within its boundaries. But the field is divisible, and if a legislator has thoroughly mastered one of its important divisions, we say that he has done well.

Mr. HILL brought to his duties a mass of useful material. He had been both a student and a man of affairs. No economic work worth while had escaped his attention. There was no line of business with which he did not have an acquaintance, and his personal experience and practical knowledge in connection with and in relation to some of the most important lines of industry qualified him to speak as an expert. He had traveled widely, both at home and abroad, not with the carelessness of the sightseer, but as a student of world conditions, and often made use of the knowledge thus acquired to illuminate discussion and shape the course of his own legislative action. Few men in this House have brought to their duties such a wealth of acquired knowledge and practical experience. As a result, his counsel and advice was sought not only by members of the House, but by Cabinet Secretaries and Presidents.

But no amount of information and learning, however great it may be, will complete the finished legislator. There are many who think they are able to see what ought to be done. To the uninitiated the enactment of a statute seems an easy task. Knowing the object of legislation, they fancy it is easy to so express it in a law that the purpose will be carried out. In fact, it is most difficult. Hence the orator, no matter how great he may be, has his limitations in Congress. Speeches seldom change votes. Debates may possibly turn the tide of history. But the man of high legislative ability must be capable of originating constructive policies and forming statutes which will effectuate their purpose. For this there is needed not only a creative mind, but also one which is logical, accurate, and precise. Men have passed through Congress and emerged with the fame of great orators; sometimes with the reputation of great debaters, and yet have left upon the statute books not so much as a mark to indicate that they have ever been Members of that body. Their ability was, in fact, confined to a flow of eloquence or a capacity for sharp retort and stinging repartee. Mr. HILL was not one of that class. In fact, I may say truthfully he rose far above it. His abilities were of the solid and enduring type, and his course in Congress marked by definite achievements. He could not only shape and defend a policy, but he could look beneath the glitter and veneer which covers the vagaries of the thoughtless and the wiles of the demagogue and expose their fallacies with merciless logic. As he passed along the evidence of his work remained behind him. We find it securely preserved in the laws of the land.

While connected with large enterprises, Mr. HILL realized fully that the greatness of this country must depend upon the prosperity and advancement of the masses of its people. Indeed he was too just in his perceptions and too clear in his thought to in any event deny them that to which they were justly entitled. While never a theorist, his dream was to make this land one which throughout its boundaries was inhabited by a prosperous, contented, and enlightened people. He believed that the laborer was worthy of his hire and that his wages should always be commensurate with his production. He wished to put hope in the mind of the toiler and ambition in his breast; to have our social system and laws so maintained as to give opportunity for all and justice to everyone. Thus the great problems of labor and capital were ever studied by him to find some solution which would rightfully apportion the share which each could claim, always regarding the necessities of the toiler as coming first and endeavoring that conditions should be so adjusted that his reasonable demands should be met. He rightfully considered that the policies of this Nation should be such as would give the greatest return and the widest opportunity possible to the working man. To accomplish this purpose he advocated that the foundation for this policy should be laid on a system of protection to our industries, and no one was better able to present the argument in favor of this position than he. He believed in it with all his heart and soul and mind and brought to its support a wealth of argument, experience, and logic which made him one of the great champions of this cause.

The ability and industry which Mr. HILL possessed in such a marked degree and the natural bent of his talents drew him into a branch of work in which industry of the highest order was absolutely necessary to complete success. While I was not in Congress during the early stages of his career, I can readily see why he was chosen to sit as a member of the Ways and Means Committee, that great committee which not only provides the means of carrying on our Government but also outlines to a large extent our fiscal policies. For proper service on this committee unremitting toil and study is necessary. So, also, a thorough mastery of every system of taxation must be acquired, and the application of these systems is so highly technical that it produces a never-ending round of labor. In this division of legislative work none excelled Mr. HILL, and few equaled him. He was indefatigable in his labors, but it was not the mere routine of the pendant. He reveled in figures, but in his hands they were not cold and dull, but lifelike and speaking. He explored all the labyrinths of the tariff until its provisions became so familiar to him that it was easy for him to enlighten others, and only one who is a member of the Ways and Means Committee can fully understand Mr. HILL'S wonderful grasp of the legislation which fell under its jurisdiction. I had the honor to become a member of that committee and the good fortune, sitting by his side, to receive the benefit of his study and application.

It must not be supposed, however, that Mr HILL confined himself to the duties of his committee, vast as they are, or that his duties were discharged with a thought single to the benefit which might be received by the region which he represented. His mind was too broad and comprehensive to be so confined. With far-seeing vision and discerning eye he looked beyond the boundaries of his own State with whirring spindles and clanging hammers. He saw the great city with its skyscrapers and its port teeming with ships from every mart of the world, toward which all our commerce centers; he saw the regions where boundless supplies of coal and iron are brought together, marked by the smoke of thousands of chimneys; he saw the broad expanse of the prairies, where under a smiling sun and beneficent sky a bounteous soil brings forth its stores to feed the waiting nations; he saw the rugged sweep of the western mountains wherein were hidden treasures surpassing the fabled wealth of the Orient and the dreams of magic; he looked across the broad expanse of the ocean to our islands blooming with tropical verdure, then again far beyond the Arctic Circle, where the midnight sun still shines upon our possessions, and south to where the Atlantic and Pacific are joined by that great canal which is the monument to the genius and enterprise of the American people. His was the vision of the statesman, which had no limitations but that of the world itself.

Mr. HILL was first of all and above all an American. He had unbounded confidence in the people of this Nation, its institutions, its form of government, its future, and believed that its destiny was to lead the march of civilization in the triumph of democracy and representative government. Well might he say with the poet:

When the centuries behind me like a fruitful land reposed,
When I clung to all the present for the promise it reposed,
When I dipt into the future far as human eye could see,
Saw the vision of the world and the wonder that would be,
Yet I doubt not through the ages our increasing purpose runs,
And the thoughts of men are widened with the process of the suns.

He saw, as many did not see, that we had come to be a world power, with duties which we must perform and responsibilities from which we could not escape. He saw that our future depended to a large extent upon that of other nations and that our policies must be broadened and our actions shaped to meet the crisis which might, and eventually did, arise. When the resistless tide of time carried us into the great European war his patriotism, ever present, arose to meet every emergency which confronted us.

Unfortunately he was sick. His mind was as active as ever, but he was weakened physically by age, incessant toil, and disease. The strain imposed by the new and staggering problems which the war brought upon us was too much for him to endure. The frail body could no longer contain the soul which still burned with tireless energy; the weakened cord snapped, and he passed away just as the curtain was rising upon the greatest drama which all history has ever known.

I had thought that perhaps he would have liked to have played his part in these eventful scenes which are now about us, just as we would have wished to have had the benefit of his judgment and capacity in this crisis of our Nation's affairs; but an all-wise Providence has said that his work is done, and we can say that it has been well and nobly done. A great debater, a great legislator, a statesman in the best of all that work implies has left us; but his work will endure ineffacably recorded in the history of his country.

Mr. FREEMAN took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, it is fitting that this House should set aside this sacred Sabbath to do honor to the memory of EBENEZER J. HILL. The tribute to him should be the product of careful thought and choice construction. His life and work are subjects that would call for the beauties of the poet's dream and the most profound thought of the philosopher. I regret that the halting sentences I may offer will not be a more finished tribute to his life and memory.

I came here in the Sixty-second Congress when he and those who had wrought with him had been reduced from the majority to the minority. As a new Member I watched with interest the changed conditions, observed how men met these changed conditions. The course of the once majority leaders had changed. There was demonstrated what we often see among men. They are often strong in battle when the offensive is on, but when reverse comes it takes a strong and peculiar character to still show that militancy which quails not before adversity but can battle in the minority as effectively as in the majority.

It is easy to advance to the blare of the bugle, but it is sometimes difficult in the forced retreat to save as many positions as may be possible. I thought, among the characters of the few men I studied, that there was in the eminent statesman from Connecticut that which made him not only a strong and militant character when the offensive was on, but a mighty force in defeat.

When legislation reversing that which he had aided in passage was presented upon this floor, never did I see a debater who seemed to successfully save as much of the situation as did EBENEZER J. HILL.

He was a remarkable character here. He was persistent, intense, and industrious in laying out plans and aiding the plans of those with whom he worked. When he came to the floor in debate he was militant. He charged like a Rupert, a Navarre, a Stonewall Jackson, or a Sheridan. He threw all his intellectual force and all the might of his militant being into the debate. Seldom, if ever, did I see EBENEZER J. HILL worsted in an intellectual combat on this floor. He combined the two qualities of militancy in debate and persistency in preparation.

Years ago Prof. Swing, in criticising the then great iconoclast, Robert G. Ingersoll, attributed Mr. Ingersoll's peculiar course to an interesting trait of human nature that compelled a man who had been a great advocate, once having taken up a cause, to follow it so far that it became his master. Out of his discussion Prof. Swing crystallized his thought into this expression, "The master of a learned profession at last becomes its slave."

The best that we have in life, those things that we idolize, those virtues that we extol, often become the most tyrannic of our being, the most destructive of our lives. As I sat here this afternoon and listened to the words of our eminent and beloved leader, JAMES R. MANN, paying rich, deserved, and loving tribute to his deceased colleague, I thought of him and EBENEZER J. HILL together; not that they were of the same trend and bent of thought—because they frequently differed—but because in the matter of industry they resembled each other so much. True, our deceased brother had passed his three score years and ten; yet he seemed vigorous, and promised well for years to come. I have no doubt that, speaking by and large, call the malady to which he succumbed what you will, it was industry, excessive, overwrought industry that called him home. That industry is calling home so many I hope the warning will be effective to some who are now straining under the lash and scourge of tyrannic industry.

Our Brother HILL had his triumphs. They have been recounted here. But one remarkable triumph I must advert to, which must have been a matter of distinctive pride to him. He was a lifelong supporter of a policy on which he believed the welfare of America and Americans rested, the protection of American industry and American labor. He was in the minority. Yet when the great world war came on, after a great line of industries had been neglected in America, over the repeated warning of Representative HILL, he presented to an adverse Ways and Means Committee the facts developed by his study on the dye industry. He pointed to our national need, and overcame the prejudice of a majority of that committee. They said: "Yes, Mr. HILL, we accept your facts, we acknowledge the force of your reasoning, and we will write into law a concrete admission to you that you are right, and the country will profit by it. We will lay a measure of protection around this great industry that we need so much to keep our textile industries going, and furnish a measure of preparation for the conflict that is on."

The protection that Mr. HILL obtained for the dye industry will be the greatest legislative monument which can be raised in his behalf. It will stand as a tribute to his industry and a vindication of his life's course. With others I was permitted to attend the last rites accorded him up there in that New England State. They were held on a beautiful, bright autumn afternoon in Norwalk, the city of his home. The silenced mill wheel, the closed business doors, the vast concourse of people, the coming from every part of the State of the Commonwealth's greatest, attested the esteem in which he was held. The tributes paid from the pulpit before which he had so often sat were worthy of the gifted men who spoke them and of the great subject which called them forth.

Under the soft radiance of a sinking sun we repaired to the hillside resting place of Norwalk's dead. We passed under the trees which were already paying tribute to earth for their season's glory and annual life.

There was the fading leaf. Every color of the rainbow was depicted in the foliage of Connecticut's fields and forests. There was the maturing of corn. There were the ripening pome and grape ready for gathering before the winter came. Nature was giving evidence that time's penalties were being exacted as well as man's rewards were being granted. There on that afternoon we laid away all that remained of that stalwart character—a character as rugged as the rocks and hills round his Connecticut home. I saw the rich fruitage ready for the gathering, but the richest ripened product of all New England that day returned to earth was this eminent citizen, mighty legislator, and true American.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, others have referred to the long and honorable history of the Hill family in Connecticut. I shall touch upon that subject no further than to say that with Mr. HILL it was not only a matter of pardonable family pride but it was both a source of inspiration and a challenge to his best efforts not only to maintain the high record already made by his progenitors but to add to it. Instead of being content to rest upon laurels won by those gone before, he acted upon the belief that he had a heritage which could be maintained only by his own highest endeavor. The record of Mr. HILL as business man and public official prior to his first election to this body has been referred to also and may be summed up by saying that both were worthy of the man whom later you came to know here, worthy of the long line of his forbears, and worthy of the great State that he loved, served and honored by serving.

He took his seat in this body in 1895 at the beginning of the Fifty fourth Congress. He came with no previously acquired reputation as a public speaker. In fact, there was nothing on the surface at that time to indicate that he would prove to be more than simply a worthy Member of that honorable class of substantial men of affairs known here as safe, level headed, and dependable, but not leaders of the thought of other men.

In this respect Mr. HILL furnishes in some measure a parallel to another distinguished son of Connecticut. I refer to the lamented Senator Orville H. Platt, who, coming to the Senate without being known outside the boundaries of his own State and with no outward apparent promise of special distinction, rose slowly but surely by his own fine effort and the irresistible force of his own high character to be one of the truly great Senators of his time, known throughout the land and across the seas.

The development of Mr. HILL into one of the most forceful and convincing debaters this House has produced in many years is an interesting story well known to the older Members of the House. The fact that he was such is well known to all of us, having been demonstrated many times on the floor of this House and on the stump in many a hard-fought campaign.

The secret of Mr. HILL's success as a public speaker and debater is really no secret at all. His power lay not so much in fine phrases or rhetoric of any kind as in the irresistible force of the logic of facts. So buttressed with stubborn facts was every argument that it was a most difficult matter to dislodge him or drive him from a position. He spared no pains, toil, or expense in thoroughly equipping and arming himself with essential facts, and so carefully were they marshaled that he was ready at all times to use them to advantage against all comers.

During the vacation periods between sessions of Congress—and, strange as it now may seem, there were formerly vacations—while other Members enjoyed a needed rest or replenished depleted bank accounts by attending to business at home, Mr. HILL made it the rule rather than the exception to journey abroad, sometimes to our outlying possessions, frequently to foreign countries, and one time all the way around the world. These trips he made not simply for pleasure, not even for his own information or education, but for the purpose of more thoroughly equipping himself for the effective performance of his duties as a Representative of the people. The natural result followed. He became a tower of strength in his own political party, a power in this House, and a most effective and useful Representative of his people.

Whatever else may be said of the House of Representatives, good, bad, or indifferent, this is true: The Member who knows what he is talking about, knows his subject thoroughly, knows it better than other Members know it, invariably commands the attention, the interest, and the respect of the House On this sound premise Mr. HILL proceeded and by adhering to it preeminently succeeded.

Others might be content with skimming the surface. He insisted upon going to the bottom of whatever subject engaged his attention. Recognizing the illimitable realm of human knowledge and the narrow limitation upon human endeavor, he did not attempt to cover the field of the universe and did not pretend to know all that is to be known. The field chosen by him, however, was always covered in a most thorough manner. He never hesitated to admit his lack of information or to seek information from others on a subject with which he had reason to believe them to be more familiar than himself.

On the other hand, he was ready to impart information to those less informed on any subject than himself, and he was so widely known to be thoroughly posted on a number of such highly important matters that he was being called upon constantly to give information.

The two most important specialties to the study of which Mr. HILL devoted his tireless energy and commanding ability were revenue legislation, especially tariff legislation, and banking and currency. On these two subjects he was the peer of any Member of either branch of Congress.

It is often said of him that he was a tireless worker. He needed no prodding. The spur of a biennial election was misapplied in his case. His district, his State, and the country would have been the gainer if he could have been elected for 20 years at one time, so that he could have given his entire time and energies to the work he loved so much. He did not complain, however, but in every even year for twelve successive times he made a vigorous campaign, never failing of success except in 1912, when his own party, rent in twain, went down before the united opposition.

As we saw him toiling here under the load that grew heavier year by year we knew what would be the inevitable and all too early result.

Near the close of the twenty-first year of his service here he fell in the harness. He had passed the allotted span of three score and ten years and yet appeared to be unusually vigorous until he suffered a breakdown less than a year before his death. After that he made a brave fight, appearing in his place in the House oftentimes, and on one occasion, not many weeks before the end, making a somewhat extended speech with much of his old-time zeal and vigor. However, the inexorable destroyer would not be denied, and on September 27, 1817, all that was not mortal of this able, loyal, and faithful son of Connecticut and servant of an entire Nation passed to the beyond. Of him it may be said as truly as of any man who ever died on the field of battle that he gave his life for his country.

Mr. GLYNN. Mr. Speaker, a considerable portion of the district which I represent was formerly a part of the district long represented in Congress by the Hon. EBENEZER J. HILL, whose memory we honor to-day. My home county of Litchfield was a part of his district, and for 18 years he was our Representative. We were proud of him in those days, and we continued to be proud of him until the day of his death. We knew of his ability, his integrity, and his energy. We realized that he was one of the leaders in this great body and that we did honor to ourselves in returning him to the halls of legislation term after term. From the Fifty-fourth to the Sixty-second Congresses, inclusive, his district comprised the counties of Litchfield and Fairfield, and, because of the great confidence we had in him, no other candidate was seriously considered during all of those years. We had learned to know him and to love him. We had learned to admire his force of character, his tireless energy, his keen and penetrating intellect, his power to cope with and to solve difficult economic questions.

He was not one of those who measured his value to his constituents by the amount he was able to obtain for his district in the way of appropriations, and to the honor and glory of his constituents be it said that they never measured his worth by any such yardstick. The scope of his vision was too broad to be limited by any such narrow horizon, and while he was always loyal and faithful to the interests of his district and State, he was of that splendid type of men who think and legislate from a national viewpoint.

My acquaintance with Mr. HILL commenced more than a score of years ago and gradually grew in intimacy. In the early years I knew him as the average man knows his Member of Congress back home, meeting him only infrequently when he happened to be in that part of the district where I resided; but I early realized, as did his constituents, that he was a tower of strength. When we were asked by a stranger the name of our representative in Congress, we were proud to say that it was E. J. HILL. We somehow felt that we had contributed more than our share, that we had a man in Congress great enough to be a leader. Respect and admiration ripened into genuine affection. He made enduring friendships and never went back on a friend. He was faithful to every trust. It was not in his nature to wrong any human soul nor to take a mean advantage of any man. He was a friend to every man in need.

Others have spoken of his ancestry and his business activities, and it is unnecessary for me to dwell upon these. During his service of more than 20 years in Congress he was identified with practically all of the important legislation enacted during that time and rendered invaluable service as a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency and the Committee on Ways and Means. He possessed a constructive mind and was a statesman of the best and truest type. He abhorred sham and hypocrisy. He had the courage of his convictions and would never compromise upon a question of principle. He had no sympathy for the demagogue or timeserver. As a speaker and debater he was always ready, always eloquent, keen and irresistible in his logic—a veritable intellectual gladiator.

Mr. HILL'S last appearance in the House was on July 25 last, when he rose to a question of privilege involving the constitutional rights of the House of Representatives. In the course of a five-minute talk he vigorously assailed the attempt on the part of the Senate to invade the prerogatives of the House, and called attention to the fact that under the Constitution the power of issuing bonds and incurring indebtedness must originate in the House of Representatives. The day before the Secretary of the Treasury had appeared before the Finance Committee of the Senate and proposed $5,000,000,000 of additional funds, part to be raised by bonds and part to be raised by certificates of indebtedness, matters within the function of the House to originate.

In closing, he drew vigorous and prolonged applause when he said:

I feel it my duty, Mr. Speaker, to call the attention of the House of Representatives to this invasion of its prerogatives, so that in the future, when such a bill comes to us for consideration, if nobody else does it, I will move to send it back, as Mr. Sereno E. Payne once did under similar circumstances, and the House refused to consider it. I think we ought to stand on our rights and have this business attended to more promptly than it has been attended to. If I am not mistaken, I have the support of the Republican Members of this House in standing by the Administration during the war, but we want to do it legally, fairly, and squarely, and I therefore call the attention of the House to this invasion of our prerogatives.

The story of his life is the story of a boy reared from good New England stock, who early learned the value of time and the value of a dollar, because he had little of either to spare in his early days. It is the story of a boy who made the most of his opportunities and was not afraid to work, a boy of splendid mental attainments, rugged honesty, and force of character, who would command respect anywhere and who knew no such word as failure. Others might spend their time complaining because of lack of opportunity, but not so with E. J. HILL. He turned stumbling blocks into stepping stones and could succeed where others failed. All his life he was a student of men and things and was never satisfied with a superficial knowledge of anything. He was an encyclopedia of information. He has carved for himself an enduring name in the history of his country, and his work will be a lesson and an inspiration to the young men of this Nation through the coming years. With many things yet undone, with many splendid dreams yet unrealized, with his intellectual powers still undimmed, he passed from this earthly abode, leaving as a rich heritage a splendid record of accomplishment and the memory of a life well spent.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, it was not my privilege to know EBENEZER J. HILL intimately. I first meet him five years ago, but from the opening of the Sixty-fifth Congress to the time of his illness I was associated with him on several occasions and had opportunity to observe his work as a legislator.

He was a companionable man, ready and effective in debate, a leader not only in his own party but in the House. His record stands out as one of service and achievement. His appointment to the Ways and Means Committee was a merited recognition of his ability.

Mr. HILL was always informed because he was always a student. With unflagging industry he applied to every new problem the test of experience of years. There was not a subject of financial or economic importance which might affect the welfare of his district, his State, or his country on which he was not informed. He worked always with directness of purpose and sureness of plan. He believed that a public office is a public trust.

To his duties he was ever faithful, and in this he was true to the best traditions of New England.

The power of New England in the Congress of the United States has always been recognized. In April, 1910, the Hon. THETUS W. SIMS, of Tennessee, present chairman of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, quoted from an article in the Kansas City Times, in which it was pointed out that the aggressiveness, the sagacity, the courage of the people of New England commanded admiration, for despite a sterile soil and an inhospitable climate they controlled the politics and policy of the United States. And further, it was added:

The six States which form the New England group have figured prominently in the settlement of every question that has been presented to the Republic.

The reason given for the recognized leadership of New England by the writer was that long service of Members from the States mentioned naturally entitled such men to greater influence.

Mr. HILL'S life was a conspicuous example thereof. No man in Connecticut's history served the State in the House of Representatives so long as he. The Hon. E. Stevens Henry, it is true, entered Congress at the same time in 1895, but his service numbered 18 years. Mr. HILL was completing his twenty-first year. The late Senator Joseph R. Hawley, whose 28 years of public life at Washington stand unequaled for Connecticut, was in the House but four years, advancing to the United States Senate in 1881. The Hon. Orville H. Platt was 26 years in Washington, during all of which time he was in the Senate. Excepting these two illustrious men, the only other public servant of the State whose record as a national legislator exceeded that of Mr. HILL'S was the Hon. Samuel W. Dana, of Middletown. Mr. Dana was in the House from 1796 to 1810, and in the Senate from 1810 to 1821, a total of 25 years in Washington. In his own district, one must go back to the days of the Hon. John Davenport, of Stamford, who was in the House as Representative at Large and later as Congressman from the fourth district, from 1799 to 1817, 18 years, to approach the service of the man whose memory we have come to-day to honor. Mr. HILL'S record is indeed an unique one, and one that will not be excelled in Connecticut in many years.

There are but nine men in Congress to-day who sat in the Fifty-fourth Congress when Mr. HILL first entered national life—Mr. CANNON of Illinois, Mr. JONES of Virginia, Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts, Mr. FAIRCHILD of New York, Mr. CRISP of Georgia, Mr. FOSS of Illinois, Mr. MONDELL of Wyoming, and Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Our beloved Speaker had been in the Fifty-third Congress, and returned in the Fifty-fifth Congress, from which time he had been associated with Mr. HILL in many important matters, and has on more than one occasion indicated his admiration of our deceased colleague.

The longer an industrious man remains in service, the more valuable he is to his constituency, the greater opportunity he has for the development of his talents, and the richer is his State for his achievements.

Mr. HILL was in Congress when the United States declared war against Spain in 1898, and when the existence of a state of war thrust upon it by the Imperial German Government was formally declared in 1917. He has seen other problems, less historic, indeed, but in themselves large, met and overcome by the country he served so faithfully.

He left to his family the priceless heritage of a life well spent. It should be to them a rich source of consolation; and it should be to every man an incentive to added effort.

When a man has worked so ceaselessly as did Mr. HILL for the things he thought best, one wishes that an All-Knowing Providence had granted him more years in which to continue his constructive activity and to enjoy association with those for whom and with whom he labored, but in his being taken off "still achieving, still pursuing," his family and his friends are comforted with the assurance that when he entered into his reward, his stewardship was accounted for a hundredfold.

Mr. TILSON resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. FREEMAN. Mr. Speaker, it is acknowledged by all that in the death of the late EBENEZER J. HILL the State of Connecticut has lost an able and faithful Representative, and this Congress and the Nation at large has been deprived of a strong and experienced legislator at a time when such effective services as Mr. HILL was able to render were most sorely needed.

I remember in 1894 when he was first elected to represent the fourth district of Connecticut, and since that time I have watched his career here in Congress with ever-increasing interest and appreciation. It was my privilege first to meet him personally in the summer of 1903 when he paid a visit to his son at the encampment of the Connecticut National Guard, and at that time I was impressed with his thorough knowledge of the subjects he discussed, his wealth of information, and his strong, sincere convictions upon the financial and economic questions of the day. At that time his party was in control of the affairs of the Government, and he certainly devoted to his share of the task all his energy, industry, and talent. Because of the unfortunate division of our party in 1912 Mr. HILL failed of reelection, but I had a long talk with him at Bridgeport in the winter of 1913-14, and I was surprised at his intimate acquaintance with the affairs of Congress—his knowledge of the state of the national Treasury, and of many other matters which indicated that with the exception of not being daily upon the floor of the House, he was as active and as interested as if still a Member of Congress.

When he was reelected by his district in 1914 it was my fortune to be elected as his colleague, and from that time until his death I relied upon his counsel and advice. I found him one of the most hard-working Members of Congress, but never too busy to aid, encourage, and advise a new Member of Congress. During his last illness he remained constantly in touch with the situation here, with intellect unimpaired, and when "God's finger touched him" he had well earned eternal rest and peace.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Members desiring to print remarks on the life and services of Mr. HILL may have permission to do so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that Members desiring to print in the RECORD remarks on the life and services of Mr. HILL may have permission to do so. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. In compliance with the resolution already adopted the House will stand adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT.

Accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Monday, March 4, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

MONDAY, March 4, 1918.

(Legislative day of Saturday, March 2, 1918.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian.

THOMAS J. WALSH, a Senator from the State of Montana, appeared in his seat to-day.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA TELEPHONE SYSTEM.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster General in response to a resolution (S. Res. 207) of February 25, 1918.

Mr. GORE. I ask that the communication be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. NORRIS What is the request?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That the communication of the Postmaster General, in response to a resolution passed February 25, regarding the telephone service of the District of Columbia be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. NORRIS. Why not have it read? It seems to me that the answer of the Postmaster General ought to be read.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to hear it read.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the communication will not be read. We took a recess on Saturday for the purpose of expediting the unfinished business, and I am very anxious to begin the consideration of Senate bill 3714.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want to delay the unfinished business, but it seems to me that the answer of the Postmaster General on the question we have submitted to him ought at least to be read to the Senate, although if the Senator from North Carolina objects I will be content to have it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no earthly objection to its being printed in the RECORD.

Mr. GORE. I will state that I did not prefer the request to have it read, because I apprehended the objection suggested by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. NORRIS. Let it be printed in the RECORD, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request is that the communication of the Postmaster General be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The communication is as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., March 4, 1918.

Hon. THOMAS R. MARSHALL,
Senate of the United States of America.

MR. PRESIDENT: I have received Senate resolution of date February 25, reading as follows:

"Whereas it is reported in the public press that the Postmaster General of the United States offered to take over and operate in behalf of the United States the telephone system of the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co. within the District of Columbia: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate the proposition made by him to the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co., and also to transmit to the Senate any information which he may possess authorizing him to make such, or any, proposition looking to the taking over of the operation by the Government of said telephone system."

In compliance with this resolution I deem it proper to recite the circumstances referred to therein and officially reported by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia sitting as a public utility commission, to wit:

"Chairman BROWNLOW. I asked the Postmaster General if he desired to be heard in this matter, since I know of the interest of the Post Office Department in the telephone situation. He was not able to be present, but he sent as representing him the chairman of the telephone and telegraph committee of the Post Office Department. Mr. Chance is present and desires to make a statement.

"Mr. CHANCE. Mr. Commissioner, my statement is very short. I am here representing the Postmaster General, and he has directed me to say that, if he is given authority, the Post Office Department can take over the entire telephone service within the District of Columbia and operate it without increased charges to the patrons and without reducing the salaries of the employees and pay for it out of the surplus revenues of the Postal Service.

"That is all I have to say."

With respect to the information upon which the statement made by Mr. Chance was made, beginning with the statement of the undesirable telephone situation prevailing, and threatened, in the District of Columbia, it may be well to briefly detail the history of the subject matter, the measures proposed heretofore by Members of Congress looking to its treatment, and the relation of the Post Office Department to such measures, as well as the proposals of the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co. itself.

In the Sixty-fourth Congress, early in 1917, bills were introduced in the Senate by the Hon. THOMAS P. GORE, of Oklahoma, and the Hon. ATLEE POMERENE, of Ohio, and in the House of Representatives by the Hon. David J. Lewis, of Maryland, which provided for the taking over of the Washington telephone system by the Government, with a view to its substantial extension and development to meet existing and future needs. These bills made provision for the development of an adequate telephone service for both public and private needs, as they should arise. The bill of Senator POMERENE was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate, which committee requested the opinion of the Postmaster General as to its merits. The Postmaster General, in response to such request, gave the bill his approval.

The like bill in the House of Representatives was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia of the House, and the Postmaster General was asked in like manner by said committee for his opinion on the merits of the bill, as were also the District Commissioners of the District of Columbia. Both the Postmaster General and the commissioners made reply, giving their approval to the measure. If any of those measures had been enacted into law, the present telephone system in Washington, which may be described at this time as deplorable, would have been avoided.

The House bill was made the subject of extended hearings before the Committee on the District of Columbia which continued so near to the close of the session that no final action was taken on the bill.

Meanwhile, with the same objects in view, the Postmaster General caused to be made by telephone experts a careful study and investigation of the telephone situation in Washington, with a view to definitely ascertaining the necessary operating expenses of conducting the system as a part of the Postal Service. These experts reported on the 1st day of May, 1917, that the final cost of a network—including value of the existing plant—embracing 80,000 telephone stations, would be $10,862,310. The network of the present system in 1915, the latest previous data, included 54,671 telephones. The larger network proposed would have fully met the needs of the city for both its present and prospective emergencies.

With respect to the costs of operating the telephone system these experts, after careful study, reported that including capital, depreciation, and all operating expenses—if conducted by the Post Office Department as a part of the Postal Service—the cost per telephone could easily be reduced more than one-third. The Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co. estimates the expense per telephone in 1918, without making allowance for capital charges or taxes, to be $38.10, which is grossly in excess of what the cost would be if the service were operated by the Post Office Department. Such was the proposal of Members of Congress and the Post Office Department to meet the requirements of a public and private character for telephone service within the District of Columbia.

In its statements made before the Public Utilities Commission the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co. reports having 71,276 telephones in December, 1917, and it proposes to increase this number to 75,000 during the year 1918, a number which may prove inadequate. The study made for the Post Office Department, by the expert engineers referred to above, contemplated a network of 80,000 telephones. Their study was based on the data of the year 1915, it being the latest available, and represented as stated 54,671 telephone stations, with a capital of $6,241,134. Thus the addition of an investment of $4,621,176 would have added 25,329 stations to the network, raising it to 80,000 in number, and at the same time rendering it susceptible to prompt and economical extension and development. The proposal of the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co. for the year 1918 raises its capital to $10,694,001, but raises the number of telephones to only 75,500.

The quality of service rendered in the city of Washington was extremely low before the war, the lowest per telephone reported for any city in the United States in 1914, while the average rate charged for completed calls was the highest for all the cities reporting, with one exception, as is shown by the following table:

Average calls per telephone and average rate per 100 calls in different cities.

	Annual calls per phone.[1]	Average telephone rate per 100 local calls.[1]
New York, Manhattan [2]	962	$4.45
Brooklyn [2]	875	4.21
Washington, 1914 [2]	823	4.21
Washington, 1915 [2]	888	3.88
Washington, 1917 [2]	1,099	3.13
Baltimore [2]	993	3.53
Philadelphia [3]	1,445	2.20
Pittsburgh [2]	1,998	1.52
Cleveland [2]	2,000	1.48
Indianapolis [3]	2,238	1.15
Spokane [2]	2,155	1.08
Kansas City [3]	3,366	1.05
Rochester [3]	2,940	1.04

Buffalo [3]	2,710	.77
Louisville [3]	4,027	.69

While Washington is given a service of only 800 to 1,100 calls per telephone, the average calls per telephone in the United States was 2,055, according to the census of 1912, and some of the cities show a phone utilization of more than 3,000 calls per annum. For this half-normal service I am informed that the average paid per 100 calls in Washington was $3 to $4, when the average for the United States was 89 cents per hundred for the independents, with a general average of less than $1 per hundred in some of the large cities.

Obviously, the test of any service institution is the amount and quality of service rendered the public, stated in terms of the number of employees and the amount of capital employed to obtain such service.

The committee of the Post Office Department on telephones and telegraphs which made an elaborate investigation of this subject, the report of which I had the honor to transmit to the Senate on the 31st day of January, 1914, and which was published as Senate Document No. 399, second session Sixty-third Congress, found that the assumption by the Post Office Department of the function of electrical communication would permit of substantial savings and economies through the coordination of these two now diversely organized and operated services of communication. They differ only in this: That the railroad or personal carrier bears one communication and the wires carry the other.

The following bureaus or services are now maintained, each independently, by the Post Office Department and the telephone system:

THE POST OFFICE.	THE TELEPHONE SYSTEM.
Postmaster General.	President of the company.
Four assistants.	Vice presidents and directors.
Law department.	Law department.
Auditor.	Auditor.
Treasurer's office.	Treasurer's office.
Purchasing bureau.	Purchasing bureau.

The "commercial account" under private management includes such items as "advertising, canvassing, promotion, revenue accounting, revenue collecting, collection expense, salaries of general officers, and their clerks." These are susceptible of complete elimination by postal methods. Indeed, it is not too much to say that their entire revenue-collecting and accounting system can be practically displaced under postal methods and the work reduced substantially to one of maintenance and development.

Much—indeed, nearly all—the above duplicating official telephone personnel represent established functions in the Post Office Department, dischargeable by it with slight, if any, additional expense. There is, besides, the very considerable item of earnings on investment. Public utility commissions proceed on the theory that private enterprises are entitled to claim, if they can earn, a return of 8 per cent per annum, which is not unreasonable to private enterprise. Government capital, on the other hand, should cost only about one-half this amount. Taking the savings from unification of mail and telephone communication systems, along with the immense saving in capital charges, I have the fullest confidence in the statement made to the District Utilities Commission as to the results of postal management of the District telephone system if authority be given to unite it with the Postal Service.

In fact, the accomplishments suggested present a very great understatement of what postal policy and postal management can accomplish in operating the telephone system in the District of Columbia.

The suggestion that the Post Office Department enter the field of electrical communication is in no sense new or recent. As Postmaster General I have made the recommendation in my annual reports five successive times. The recommendation was made by my immediate predecessor and by many other Postmasters General. In the infancy of telephone communication a like recommendation was made by Postmaster General John Wanamaker. Among other things he stated:

"A year from next March the telephone patent expires, and unless Congress acts promptly to authorize its adoption for communication among the people it requires no stretch of the imagination to believe that in the next two years one immense syndicate will unite and control all the hundreds of telephone plants of the country as the telegraph is now controlled, or the two will be united, and then for the next 20 years the most astute attorneys will be legitimately earning large salaries in indignantly opposing the so-called attacks of future Postmasters General upon defenseless vested rights."

How prophetic this statement was! At this time how familiar we are with it! How often did we hear it when there was pending before the Congress the propositions for the establishment of the parcel post and the postal savings!

The function of communication so clearly appertains to the Government that it is provided for in the Constitution of the United States.

Communication is a means primal to the gratification of all human requirements. It should therefore be made accessible to all persons, whatever their fortunes may be, as considerations of public economy will allow. This means that ample facilities should be provided by the Government which is charged by the Constitution with this great function. It means, too, that the service should be provided at reasonable cost; in fact, at as low cost as efficient service permits, so that the largest number possible may use it. The Postal System has so realized these great objects, so formulated its rates, that the poorest self-sustaining human being can afford to use any service it performs. The only postal limitation on his communicating from end to end of the Republic is the cost of a 2-cent stamp. On the other hand, the use of these great facilities of communicating by electricity is woefully restricted among the masses of the people by the necessities of the interest of private persons who own and manage them. Among the masses of the people, even here in Washington, the Capital of the richest country of the world, the majority are shown to be denied this great convenience. The following table on the testimony of the president of the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co., testifying as to the distribution of the telephone service among the residences of the city before the Committee on the District of Columbia of the House of Representatives, speaks conclusively as to the effect of high rates and private control upon this great agency of communication:

One hundred families, paying a house rent—

Up to $20, have 10 phones—10 per cent.

Up to $35, have 23 phones—23 per cent.

Above $35, have 82 phones—82 per cent.

It is no criticism of private endeavor to quote the above facts. They represent failures—grave failures—in modern communication; but they are failures judged by postal standards, not by the standards of private enterprise. The wealth of the United States is ample to justify a complete telephone service in its Capital. Private endeavor does not have the kind of motive necessary for the accomplishment of this or other postal objects. Great organizations of national scope it has built up in that part of the field of communication which the Government has so long neglected—neglected, I say, but not surrendered either its right or duty to perform. While the postal rates in the United States are the lowest among postal systems, the following table, taken from the report of the telephone and telegraph committee of the Post Office Department, shows how postal telephone rates in other countries compare with the private rates in the United States:

Statement of the average rates for nine countries on the Continent of Europe:

Toll telephone rates.

	Distance.
	100 miles.	300 miles.	400 miles.	500 miles.	700 miles.
Continental rate	$0.20	$0.37	$0.39	$0.46	$0.53
Bell rate	.60	1.80	2.40	3.00	4.20

Of the long-distance telephone rates it has been stated by one who has made a most searching study of the question that "it costs the American as much to ship his communication over the wires, mile for mile, as it costs him to ship a ton of freight on the railway. The telephone rate equals 6 mills a mile, the average railway rate about 7 mills."

It should be added that the aggregate postal revenues in the 16 great postal systems conducting these, as well as other functions of organized communication, show a surplus profit of 20 per cent in their annual receipts. A reason why the postal system can achieve cheap rates and provide efficient service is that it has no uneconomic, no wasteful interests to serve. Hence the great disparity of the telephone rates in the United States as compared with those of postal systems, notwithstanding our postal rates are as low or lower. Hence, too, the humiliating knowledge that instead of ranking first in the frequency of our use of the telephone communication we rank low, and not high, in the use of these services.

The conclusion can not be escaped that private rate making is responsible for the out-of-date and inadequate telephone service, and for its resulting breakdown from congestion of traffic, in Washington. And the local company proposes relief only by destroying, through higher rates, even more of the existing traffic of the city. The rates now restrict the use of the phone to about one-half the utilization obtaining throughout the country. Its proposed remedy is to eliminate, by higher rates, a large part of the service that is left.

PROPOSITIONS RESTATED.

Finally, I wish to add that there is much other information gathered, studied, and compiled by the Post Office Department, reflecting on the proposition that, if given authority, the Post Office Department can achieve the results stated in the announcement made before the Utilities Commission.

In concluding I wish to repeat, on the basis of the information hereinbefore produced, and as the result of careful studies:

First. That, if given authority by the Congress, the Post Office Department can take over the telephone service of the District of Columbia and be able to—

(a) Operate it without increased charges to the patrons.

(b) Without reducing the salaries of employees.

(c) And pay for the system out of the surplus revenues of the Postal Service.

To which propositions I am able to add another:

Second. That within a reasonable time after receiving such authority the Post Office Department will permanently remove the present congestion of telephone traffic and bring about a more general use of the lines to both the Government and private patrons.

I have only to further add that so much as might be necessary of the surplus of the Post Office Department for the fiscal years 1916 and 1917 could nowhere and in no way be more appropriately applied than in giving the Government, in its stress, and the people of the Capital City permanent, adequate facilities for communication, and at reasonable rates.

Permit me also to direct attention to the fact that there is no Government engaged in the present war—there is hardly a government anywhere—which intrusts its official secrets and correspondence to unofficial and private carriers.

Respectfully,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of Lewis McKune Post, No. 27, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Minnesota, of Waseca, Minn., praying for an increase in the pensions of veterans of the Civil War, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. THOMPSON presented a petition of W. T. Sherman Post, No. 113, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Kansas, of Concordia, Kans., praying for an increase of pensions to veterans of the Civil War, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of Local Branch, International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, of Parsons, Kans., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of the Farmers' Union, of Groveland, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation fixing the price of the 1918 wheat crop at $2.50 per bushel, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. JONES of Washington presented a memorial of Local Branch, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of Bellingham, Wash., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for the placing of railroad employees under the provisions of the Federal employees' compensation act, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. McLEAN presented a petition of Local Branch No. 192, National Association of Letter Carriers, of New Britain, Conn., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Bridgeport and New Haven, in the State of Connecticut, praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of the Board of Commerce of Detroit, Mich., praying for the creation of a commission to report a plan for the adoption of a national budget system, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a petition of the Ladies' Literary Club, of Shelby, Mich., and a petition of the Pastors' Association, of Jackson, Mich., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3426) to empower the President to requisition timber and timber products for war purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 298) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 3980. A bill to prevent interference with the use of homing pigeons by the United States, to provide a penalty for such interference, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 296); and

S. 3982. A bill to suspend certain restrictions on the purchase and distribution of military stores and supplies, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 297).

STATUS OF ARMY NURSE CORPS.

Mr. FLETCHER. On January 16 the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] submitted a resolution (S. Res. 185) directing the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate to investigate and report as to the available number of trained nurses for service in the United States Army. The resolution was agreed to, and I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to makes a report (No. 299) pursuant to that resolution, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report submitted this day by Mr. FLETCHER was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Senate Report No. 299, 65th Cong., 2d sess.]

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Military Affairs, which was directed by the Senate to investigate and report upon certain matters relative to the status of the Army Nurse Corps, having had the matter under consideration, begs leave to submit herewith a memorandum from the Surgeon General of the Army giving detailed information on the subject, together with a communication of similar import from Dr. Franklin Martin, member of the advisory commission, Council of National Defense, which your committee presents as its report:

MEMORANDUM FOR THE SECRETARY OF WAR RELATING TO STATUS OF THE ARMY NURSE CORPS.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SURGEON GENERAL,
Washington, January 24, 1918.

There are at present in the United States about 200,000 nurses, of whom it is estimated between 80,000 and 90,000 are registered, the remainder being composed of graduate nurses and the so-called practical nurses. Approximately 30,000 nurses will be needed for service in the Army hospitals during the present year. In 1909 the plan was evolved whereby the enrolled nurses of the American Red Cross were constituted the reserve of the Army Nurse Corps for service in time of war or other emergency. It is estimated there are about 16,000 nurses enrolled with this organization at this time, 8,000 of whom have enrolled since the declaration of war. Nurses are also admitted into the regular corps, and for the period of the war emergency. The applications of all graduate nurses who are professionally, morally, and physically qualified for service will be given consideration, whether registered or not.

There are at present 40,000 student nurses in accredited training schools for nurses in this country, and about 13,000 graduate annually. The plan of organizing training schools in connection with Army hospitals is not believed to be practicable, and it is thought preferable to accept only nurses who have graduated from civil institutions.

It is not contemplated at this time to employ any but graduate nurses in the Army hospitals, but should conditions indicate there will be a shortage of graduate nurses, steps will be taken in ample time for the establishment of courses for nurses' aids in certain civil institutions in this country. These aids will be selected from among those women who have taken the course in home care of the sick and elementary hygiene under the American Red Cross, and also other women who are considered suitable. They will be given a course of practical instruction in a civil institution with a view to assignment as nurses' aid in an Army hospital if needed.

At the present time there are 534 members of the regular corps and 4,204 who have entered the service as reserve nurses, Army Nurse Corps, through the American Red Cross. It is believed that the present supply of nurses is sufficient to meet the prospective needs of the service.

W. C. GORGAS,
Surgeon General, United States Army.

COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE,
Washington, January 24, 1918.

From: Dr. Franklin Martin, member of advisory commission.
To: Hon. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN, chairman Senate Committee on Military Affairs.
Subject: Present and prospective supply of nurses for military service.

1. We have the honor to submit to you the following report:

2. The committee on nursing of the general medical board, Council of National Defense, will be pleased to appear before your committee at any time and submit full information regarding the present and prospective status of the nursing supply for military service.

3. In the meantime, however, I submit the following facts: There are approximately 80,000 registered nurses in the United States, 40,000 student nurses in accredited schools, 13,000 nurses graduating annually.

4. The following are figures received to-day from the Army, Navy, and Red Cross Department of Nursing:

Assigned to active duty in the Army:
From the Army Nurse Corps	534
From the Red Cross	4,204
Total	4,738
Assigned to active duty in the Navy:
From the Navy Nurse Corps	257
From the Red Cross	570
Total	827
Assigned to active duty under the Red Cross:
United States Public Health Service	70
Over-seas service	64
Specialized services in United States	3
Total number furnished by Red Cross to Army and Navy, now on active duty	4,911
Total number awaiting orders	2,500

Nine thousand nurses have been enrolled by the Red Cross since the declaration of war. The total enrollment of Red Cross nurses is approximately 17,000, which includes, however, those enrolled for special service and a proportion who are not available for active service.

5. At the present date the Army, Navy, and Red Cross are filling all demands. A mobilization camp for nurses has just been established which will facilitate the movement of nurses to their posts.

6. A definite publicity program has been planned and is in progress by the committee on nursing for the purpose of rapidly increasing enrollment for service and for strengthening the reserve. Since war was declared approximately 1,000 nurses have been enrolled for service each month.

7. This committee now has under serious consideration other radical measures to propose which, if found feasible, will, in its judgment, insure an adequate supply of nurses for the anticipated future increments, taking into consideration the increased demand when the Army shall more largely engage in active conflict.

FRANKLIN MARTIN,
Member the Advisory Commission.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. MARTIN. With the consent of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], who has charge of the pending bill, I ask leave out of order to report back from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments the bill (H. R. 9867) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 295) thereon. As the matters in the bill are very urgent, I shall endeavor to have the Senate take it up to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

ISSUANCE OF WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask permission to make a favorable report from the Committee on Finance on Senate joint resolution 133, authorizing the granting of insurance under the act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended by the act approved October 6, 1917, on application by a person other than the person to be insured, and I shall follow that, after the joint resolution has been read, with the request for unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution reported by him from the Committee on Finance. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to have the joint resolution read first. I am a member of the Finance Committee, but I know nothing about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 133) was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That insurance under the act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended by the act approved October 6, 1917, shall be granted by the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance on application made by the person to be insured or, subject to such regulations as the bureau may prescribe, by any other person.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like the Senator from Mississippi, reporting the joint resolution, to explain it, because I have not seen the joint resolution, nor have I heard it read, except as it was read from the desk just now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, in reply to the question of the Senator from Utah, I will say that we have found some difficulty in the execution of the insurance clause of the soldiers and sailors' allowance and allotment and insurance bill, growing out of the fact that we provided in the bill that the soldier alone should make the application. Many of these soldiers have gone to France; and when their agents here, or somebody on behalf of them, wants to make the application the law stands in the way. This joint resolution does not change the beneficiaries under the law; it does not widen or restrict them, or the choice of them, in any way; but it merely permits the father or the mother or any other person here to make the application for the soldier, under the provisions of the law as now written, for the insurance as now provided. It was accompanied by a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, who wanted as quick action as possible. As a consequence, the committee, not being able to be called together, was polled and all of the members of the committee that could be seen immediately signed it. It happened that the Senator from Utah was not in the Chamber, I suppose, at the time; but it was signed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], and myself.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have had a chance to read the joint resolution, and I hope it will pass at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 4012) to protect persons in the military or naval forces of the United States during the present war from loss of rights under claims initiated upon the public lands, and for other purposes (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (S. 4013) to amend certain sections of the act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 136) providing for the registration for military service of the subjects or citizens residing in the United States of a foreign country with whose Government the United States has concluded or hereafter concludes a convention or agreement consenting to such aliens being drafted into the military forces of the United States under the terms of the act approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," and all amendments thereto; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENT TO URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $15,000 for the installation of an electrically operated fog-signal whistle on the east breakwater, Nantucket Harbor, Mass., intended to be proposed by him to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill (H. R. 9867), which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

CLAIMS OF OFFICERS AND ENLISTED MEN.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3527) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of the claims of officers and enlisted men of the Army for loss of private property destroyed in the military service of the United States," approved March 3, 1885, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. SIMMONS. I suggest the absence of a quorum. I think it important before we take up the amendments to Senate bill 3914 to secure a fuller attendance than we now have.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hollis	Owen	Smoot
Beckham	Johnson, S. Dak.	Page	Sterling
Brandegee	Jones, N. Mex.	Pittman	Stone
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Poindexter	Sutherland
Culberson	Kendrick	Pomerene	Swanson
Curtis	King	Ransdell	Thomas
Dillingham	Kirby	Reed	Thompson
Fernald	Lodge	Saulsbury	Tillman
Fletcher	McCumber	Shafroth	Underwood
Gallinger	McKellar	Sheppard	Vardaman
Gerry	McNary	Sherman	Walsh
Gore	Martin	Shields	Warren
Gronna	Nelson	Simmons	Watson
Hale	New	Smith, Ga.	Williams
Harding	Norris	Smith, Md.	Wolcott
Hardwick	Nugent	Smith, Mich.
Henderson	Overman	Smith, S. C.

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent, due to illness in his family.

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], is absent by reason of illness.

Mr. BECKHAM. I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], is detained on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA TELEPHONE SERVICE.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. KING. On the 25th day of February I offered a resolution, which reads as follows:

Senate resolution 207.

Whereas it is reported in the public press that the Postmaster General of the United States offered to take over and operate, in behalf of the United States, the telephone system of the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co. within the District of Columbia: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate the proposition made by him to the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co., and also to transmit to the Senate any information which he may possess authorizing him to make such, or any, proposition looking to the taking over of and the operation by the Government of said telephone system.

I am just advised, Mr. President, that in response to this resolution, which was adopted, the Postmaster General transmitted this day to the Senate——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, we are unable on this side to hear the Senator. I should like to hear what he has to say. I ask that we may have order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Utah was not in the Chamber at the time I think when the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] asked that the communication of the Postmaster General be ordered printed in the RECORD.

Mr. KING. I rose for the purpose of submitting an objection to what was done by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator from Utah that the communication came to the President pro tempore and by the Chair was laid before the Senate, and on request of the Senator from Oklahoma and by unanimous consent it was ordered printed in the RECORD. That is the situation.

Mr. KING. Later during the day I may offer a motion to set aside the order for the printing of the report. I have just come into the Chamber and have had no opportunity to examine the communication from the Postmaster General, except very hastily, but, I believe it goes beyond the terms of the resolution. The resolution merely requested the Postmaster General to state under what law he had made a proposition, if any, for the Government to take over and operate the telephone system owned by the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co. In response to such resolution there is submitted an argument of 10 pages of typewritten matter in favor of the Government taking over the telephone system. We did not ask him for an argument in favor of governmental ownership or operation of the telephone system; we asked him by what authority of law he submitted a proposition, if one was made, to the telephone company.

Mr. STONE. Do I understand the Senator favors taking over the telephone system?

Mr. KING. I have hardly looked at the report, but I gather from it that the Postmaster General is in favor of the Government taking over the telephone system.

Mr. STONE. The Postmaster General, I understand, is in favor of it. I was asking the Senator if he is in favor of it?

Mr. KING. I am very much opposed to it. I will state to the Senator from Missouri I think that the Government of the United States has burdens enough now, and ought not to be called upon to assume additional ones, unless absolutely necessary. In my opinion, it ought not to purchase and take over the telephone system of the District of Columbia or undertake its operation. However, the question of governmental ownership or operation and control is one which can be considered in a proper way and at the proper time. But the point I am making is that when an executive officer is asked for the authority for a certain proposition, it is not a proper response to submit an argument in favor of the proposition.

Mr. STONE and Mr. JONES of Washington addressed the Chair.

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. I have nothing to say at the present moment as to whether the reply of the Postmaster General to the resolution is proper or not, nor have I anything at this moment to say as to whether the Government should take upon itself the burden indicated by the Senator from Utah, if the taking over of the system of telephones is a burden, but I do undertake to say that the system as operated in the District of Columbia is so absolutely inefficient that it would seem to me that even the Government's business would require that some better service be rendered. Whether or not that service can be better rendered in this way I do not know, but I do undertake to assert that the service could not be worse than it is.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, that is not the question which is involved in this matter. A simple resolution was adopted asking the Postmaster General to state whether he had submitted a proposition to take over and operate a certain telephone system, and if so, what law existed authorizing it; and I submit that it is not proper under that resolution for an argument to be sent to this body in favor of Government ownership or operation of the telephone system. It is that of which I am complaining. We did not ask in the resolution for the opinion of the distinguished and able official or for an argument in favor of governmental control or operation of the telephone system.

Mr. JONES of Washington and Mr. NORRIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Washington, who first addressed the chair, and then I will yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was merely curious to know whether the Postmaster General has in fact given the Senate the information asked for in the resolution.

Mr. KING. In a certain way he does furnish it. In effect he says there is no statute authorizing governmental control, but he furnishes an argument in support of the Government taking over the control and operation of the telephone system in the District. I now yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Utah that it seems to me his suggestion is that the answer of the Postmaster General is not responsive to the request of the Senate. If that be true, I presume it would be perfectly proper for the Senator or the Senate to call on the Postmaster General for another reply, but it must be apparent to the Senator that the Senate can not decide that question until it has before it the response of the Postmaster General. Therefore I think it ought either to be read to the Senate or it ought to be printed in the RECORD, so that the Senate will be able to see whether the response of the department is responsive; and if it is not, it would be very proper, it seems to me, to pass an additional resolution calling attention to the fact that it is not responsive and ask him for a more definite reply.

Mr. KING. I am inclined to think, without reading the entire reply submitted by the Postmaster General, that it is apparent he concedes a lack of authority for making a proposition for governmental control and also alleges that any proposal made was conditioned upon congressional approval. The resolution could have been answered categorically in half a dozen words. My point is that in the report submitted in reply to the resolution I do not think that part of the report which contains an argument for Federal control was responsive or proper.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if in the reply of the Postmaster General there is any indication that in the interest of the conduct of the war private conversation should be controlled in the District of Columbia?

Mr. KING. I have not had the opportunity to sufficiently acquaint myself with the report in order to determine.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And that certain hours of the day should be assigned for Government business exclusively?

Mr. KING. I do not know whether such a suggestion as that was made, but that does not reach the point to which I am calling the attention of the Senate. I am submitting to the Senate this proposition: A resolution was adopted asking the department if it made a certain proposition; and if so, to state whether there was any legal authority for the same; and I am contending that it is not the proper or orderly way for the department to submit a reply which contains an argument in favor of some governmental policy.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. As the Senator knows, I am quite in sympathy with his views on this matter, but it occurs to me that on an examination of the communication which the Postmaster General has sent it will be seen that he is simply saying, "I did not make any proposition; I merely said I would do this thing if Congress gave me authority," and besides that he goes further to make an argument to the Senate that Congress ought to give him authority. That is about the situation.

Mr. KING. I ask the Senator from Georgia if he thinks that was warranted by the resolution which was adopted?

Mr. HARDWICK. It is difficult to say. Of course the Postmaster General ought to have answered directly the question of the Senate. I think possibly he has done so, if the Senator will examine what he says. He states that the postmaster of Washington, Mr. Chance, went before the Utilities Commission and stated that if the Postmaster General would give him the opportunity he would be glad to take over and operate this system.

Of course the question of propriety which the Senator raises is not of much interest, but there are many precedents on both sides of the question in both Houses as to whether or not a Cabinet officer, having answered the specific inquiry of either one of these legislative bodies, should proceed further to advance argument in support of his views on the question about which he is asked. That is all there is in it.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield to me, and allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course, I yield, and in the Senator's time.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think that the departments and branches of the Government should be volunteering information or suggestions to Congress with respect to legislation when they are not asked for their opinions with respect to the matter?

Mr. HARDWICK. I quite agree with the Senator. I want the Senator to understand exactly what has happened. If the Senator wants my opinion, I will say that I do not think the Postmaster General delivers a message to Congress under the Constitution, and I do not think he has any right to make an argument, except as that argument is invited by the Senate or by the House. I do not think that the resolution of the Senate, which was introduced by the Senator from Utah, invited the Postmaster General to make an argument. It invited him simply to state what the facts were in connection with this matter.

Mr. KING. I wish merely to say, in conclusion, that I was not in the Chamber when the present occupant of the chair submitted this report, or I should have objected to the request of the Senator from Oklahoma that it be printed in the RECORD. The order having been made that it be printed in the RECORD, I shall not move to reconsider it; but I do want to register my protest against the course which has been pursued by the Postmaster General in this matter.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to make an inquiry.

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. REED. I understand the complaint of the Senator from Utah is that he asked the Postmaster General to answer a specific question, and that he has sent a rather long argument to the Senate?

Mr. KING. He has sent 10 pages here.

Mr. REED. Has the Senator from Utah been acquainted with the Postmaster General very long?

Mr. KING. I have had the pleasure of knowing the Postmaster General for 18 years.

Mr. REED. Then, I think the Senator might be charged with at least contributory negligence. [Laughter.]

Mr. KING. I might plead guilty.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I want to go on record in connection with this question as saying that when either House of Congress propounds an inquiry to the chief of a department, that chief is not confined to making a categorical reply. He not only can give reasons for what has been done by his department, if "invited" by the legislative branch in making an inquiry, but he can do it if it be relevant to the inquiry. So far as I have been able to see—I have not read the resolution itself but only a synopsis of it in the newspapers—the reply or the argument—call it that if you choose—is perfectly relevant to the inquiry. The inquiry is, What have you done? The reply is to state what was done, which was merely to say that if the Post Office Department were given authority, it would be glad to take over this function. Then, the inquiry was, "By what authority did you do it?" And the answer was, "By no authority of law"; but then the Postmaster General goes on to make an argument—if you choose to call it such—which is perfectly relevant to the inquiry about the reasons which, seemingly to him, justified Mr. Chance in making the proposition.

There also comes into play the other side of that; whether it is proper and right for a Senator to criticize an officer of the executive department because that officer has exercised his right of judging for himself whether or not what he said in his reply, outside of a categorical "yes" or "no," was or was not relevant. If it be granted that he has a right to go further than a mere "yes" or "no" and to put in such other things in his reply as are relevant, then it seems to me that he must be the judge of the relevancy.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I desire to ask the Senator from Mississippi what this question has to do with the general policy as to the taking over of the telephone company by the Government? What does the question of whether or not this is printed in the RECORD have upon that, and what bearing has it on the winning of the war?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It has no bearing upon the winning of the war; but I have sat here for about two weeks now and have heard some thousands of words per day—per Senator in some cases—that had no bearing at all upon the winning of the war. But it has this bearing, to answer the other part of the Senator's question, that if it were a wrong thing to ask to be authorized by Congress to do, that is one thing; if it were a right and proper and useful thing to be asked to be authorized to do, then the Postmaster General had a right to say that in his opinion it was proper, and that if it were achieved as a purpose it would be useful.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. STONE. I understood the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] to ask what the taking over of the telephone system of the District of Columbia had to do with the winning of the war.

Mr. POINDEXTER. May I correct the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator has misstated my question. My question was, What bearing would the discussion here in the Senate—the taking up of the morning hour—on the subject of whether or not this communication should be printed in the RECORD, have upon the winning of the war? If the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] will allow me, I will say that it took me on one occasion four hours to get the War Department on the telephone. I think if it can be arranged in some way so that one could get the War Department on the telephone inside of half an hour, that that would have some bearing upon the winning of the war.

Mr. STONE. If my friend from Mississippi will permit me, I wish to say——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let me conclude, and then I will yield.

Mr. STONE. No; I wish to make the statement in the time of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well.

Mr. STONE. I wish to say that it does seem to me that the effective use of the telephone in Washington has something to do with the public service of the Government, which public service has a vast deal to do with the winning or the losing of the war. I do not know what the department's troubles may be in getting telephonic connection, but my experience is something like that which has just been detailed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER]. If it takes a half hour for him, as it has often taken for me, to get connection with the departments or the bureaus of the departments, to communicate with them about the public business, then I am prepared to say that it is a matter of great importance to the public service of the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I agree perfectly with the Senator from Missouri, of course, but the inquiry of the Senator from Washington was not directed to that phase of the matter. If I had been asked the question, "What t king over the telephones had to do with the winning of the war," my answer would have been that it might have a great deal to do with it or it might not; I think probably it would have; but I was asked what all this so-called argument of the Postmaster General and what the argument now going on, in which I am participating, had to do with the winning of the war, and my answer was frankly nothing at all.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, just a word. The Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Mississippi are good lawyers, but certainly they have forgotten the rules of evidence or have misapplied them when justifying the reply of the Postmaster General to the simple interrogation which was propounded to him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I will not yield for the present; I will do so in a moment. We are not discussing whether or not it is advisable to take over the telephone system. We are not discussing whether or not the telephone system has been inefficient. We may come to a discussion of that question, and the great knowledge of the Senator from Missouri about telephone systems will doubtless be of great advantage to us when we shall discuss that question; but I submit again that when a proposition is submitted to an executive officer asking a question——

Mr. STONE. The Senator must not misrepresent me.

Mr. KING. Let me complete my statement. I do not yield until I conclude, and then I shall yield to the Senator. When a question is submitted asking for a reply as to whether or not there is any legal authority for a proposition which it is reported the Postmaster General submitted, in my opinion it is not relevant for him to submit an elaborate argument in favor of the governmental control of a telephone system. It would have been just as irrelevant if a question had been submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, if there had been some publication to the effect that he had proposed to take over for the Government all of the railroads of the United States, asking him by what authority he made the proposition, and he had replied with an exhaustive argument in favor of governmental ownership and control of railroads. That would not be relevant; it would not be proper; and I submit the propriety of it could be challenged by any Senator.

Now I yield to the Senator from Missouri, if he desires to propound a question.

Mr. STONE. No; I do not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I had asked the Senator to yield to me first.

Mr. KING. I beg the Senator's pardon; I yield to him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, in the first place, the Postmaster General made no proposition to take over the telephones. All that was said was that, if the authority were granted by the Congress, the Post Office Department would gladly take them over. So much for that.

Now, the Senator from Utah is himself a great lawyer, and, being a lawyer, he ought to know that a Cabinet officer having an inquiry directed to him is not in the attitude of a witness on the stand in a court of justice and that the technical rules of legal evidence do not apply to him; but, even if the technical rules of legal evidence did appear, when a witness in court is asked a question the court will not let counsel confine the witness to a categorical reply; the witness has a right to explain the reasons why he makes the reply or to explain the reply or to modify it from a "yes" or "no."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] introduced a resolution, which the Senate passed, and so it became a Senate resolution, making an inquiry of the Postmaster General. The Postmaster General has responded to that resolution, and the response is laid before the Senate by the Presiding Officer. It has never been read and it has not yet been printed in the RECORD, so that Members of the Senate may have an opportunity to read it. I have not read it, and I presume no Member of the Senate has read it. The Senator from Utah himself, who has the copy in his possession at the present time, has only glanced through it, and he says in effect that it is not responsive to the resolution of the Senate. Now, it seems to me the proper course to pursue, since we have not been allowed to hear it read, is to wait until to-morrow, so that Senators may have an opportunity to read the response, and then if the Senator from Utah still thinks the answer of the Postmaster General does not respond to his resolution, it would be perfectly proper, and I would be glad to see it done, to have a resolution introduced and passed that would call for a more definite response; but we certainly ought not to be asked now to say that the answer of the Postmaster General is not responsive when we have neither read it nor had an opportunity to read it.

The Senator from Utah referred to other Senators as great lawyers. That reference can also be made to the Senator himself, and I should like to suggest to him that if he made a motion in a court and in response to his motion some document or report had been introduced on the other side by order of the court and he determined that the production of the paper or the document was not an answer and a compliance with the order of the court, he could not expect the court to pass on his request, reject the report, and ask for an additional report until the court had an opportunity to examine the report that had been made.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Utah is not making any request that calls for a determination by the Senate as to whether or not the resolution adopted was complied with or was not complied with.

Mr. NORRIS. I understood from what the Senator said that he did not regard the reply as a proper answer. It may be that when we have an opportunity to read it we may all agree with the Senator. Certainly I am not finding fault with him for wanting a direct reply to the resolution. I would be glad, so far as my vote goes, to assist in bringing about such a reply, if the answer of the Postmaster General is not responsive; but before I take any action officially to do that I want an opportunity either to read or to have read that response.

When it is read I do not believe that we ought to take it upon ourselves to say that the Postmaster General might have answered this request with fewer words; that he might have done it in one sentence, whereas he has used 100 sentences. We must permit him to use some discretion in his answer; in other words, we ought not to begin now in the Senate a censorship proposition. I confess if we ever did begin it the Postmaster General would be the right official to begin with, because it would give him some of his own medicine.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. NORRIS. But instead of doing something that might be in the nature of a censorship of his department, we ought to give the Postmaster General the widest latitude to respond. I now yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think the Senator misunderstood the statement which I made. I said in substance, as I recall, that, taking the entire report, I believed that it was an answer, that it was a confession that there was no law authorizing him to take control or operate the telephone system, and that any proposal made calls for legislation. My criticism is that the distinguished Postmaster General submitted an argument, for which we did not ask, in favor of legislation by Congress.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it may be that when I have examined the reply of the Postmaster General I will entirely agree with the Senator; but I understood the Senator to say, when he first took the floor on this subject being brought up, that he expected later on to make a motion of some kind affecting it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I dislike to take a moment of the valuable time of the Senate in continuing this discussion, but if the Postmaster General did make his usual argument in behalf of Government ownership of telephones it does not surprise me, although I think he had no right to do it in answering a direct question that emanated from the Senate. The Postmaster General loads down every report that he makes with arguments in favor of Government ownership of telegraphs and telephones; but Congress has not paid any attention to them, and I do not believe that Congress will pay any attention to what he has said in response to the Senate resolution in this instance.

Just one further word, Mr. President, and I am done.

In view of what has been said, I can not for the life of me understand how a minority Senator, in my person, can get connection with the War Department very promptly over the telephone. I have had no trouble, not the least in the world, and I have had my secretary call the War Department a dozen times in the last 10 days. I have always gotten the connection, and have made appointments to see officials of the War Department. For Senators to say that it takes two hours to get telephone connection with the War Department surprises me beyond measure.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator a question just there?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I have never found any difficulty in being landed at the War Department by the telephone company in Washington; but after you get into the War Department, under the management of Government employees, they pass you about from one place to another, and it may take hours or it may take five minutes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I confess I have not had that trouble; but, if that be so, it is not the fault of the telephone company.

Mr. President, we have had 40,000 people loaded into this District in the last six months, and of course there is some disarrangement of everything connected with the Government service. While I do not speak for the telephone company, because I do not know anything at all of the officials, I think this is a matter that might well rest until we have an investigation, if one is required, to ascertain whether the service here is good or bad or indifferent. I know that in every country on the face of the earth where they have tried government ownership of telephones they have had a service that was utterly execrable, and some of us know that from personal experience in Germany and in England and in France; and it does not compare with the service we have had in the United States.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] seems to overlook the fact that in the Senate the less we know about a subject the more we are disposed to discuss it. The Postmaster General served for a number of years in the House. He is familiar with the rules and practices which prevail in the Senate. He knows that there is no rule in the Senate which requires a speech to be germane to the subject. If not the rule, that certainly is the practice; and if he had confined himself rigorously to the subject he would have sinned not only against the rule but against all the precedents and practices which obtain in this body. I may say that if his answer is not direct—and I have not had an opportunity to examine it—of course steps will be taken to obtain a direct answer. For the present we ought to proceed on the maxim that that is certain which can be made certain.

My purpose, however, in rising was to say that my original intention was to ask that the report be read into the RECORD, in order that Senators might hear it this morning. This discussion has hardly risen to the dignity of an ex parte proceeding, because Senators have not heard it. I asked that the report be printed, rather than that it be read, because I feared that objection might be made to the reading. I knew how anxious, not to say how impatient, Senators were to proceed with the regular order. I say this in explanation of why I did not ask to have it read, so that if a discussion was to be had Senators could proceed with the document clearly in their minds. I will merely add to that that the objections indicated by the Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from Utah justify the fear which I entertained as to having the document read.

WAR FINANCE CORPORATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3714) to provide further for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to provide credits for industries and enterprises in the United States necessary or contributory to the prosecution of the war, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. The pending amendment is in section 7, on page 13, where it is proposed to strike out and insert——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, in order that we may save time I have consented that the bill be laid aside until to-morrow. I have conferred with the committee about it, and I am satisfied that owing to certain conditions we shall facilitate final action upon the bill by letting it go over until to-morrow.

I therefore ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. GORE. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 9054, being the Agricultural appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9054) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to state the pending amendment.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, it has been suggested with considerable force that Senators did not apprehend that this measure would be taken up at this time. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum in order to afford Senators an opportunity to be advised.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oklahoma suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Swanson
Beckham	Jones, N. Mex.	Page	Thomas
Borah	Jones, Wash.	Poindexter	Thompson
Culberson	Kirby	Ransdell	Trammell
Curtis	Lodge	Saulsbury	Underwood
Dillingham	McCumber	Shafroth	Vardaman
Fernald	McKellar	Sheppard	Wadsworth
Fletcher	McLean	Sherman	Walsh
Gallinger	McNary	Shields	Warren
Gore	Martin	Simmons	Watson
Gronna	Nelson	Smith, Ga.	Weeks
Hale	New	Smoot	Williams
Harding	Norris	Stone	Wolcott
Hardwick	Nugent	Sutherland

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] is necessarily detained.

Mr. HOLLIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are detained on official business.

Mr. MCNARY. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] on account of illness.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], who are in Iowa in attendance upon the funeral of the wife of the senior Senator.

Mr. ASHURST. I announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] on account of sickness.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FLETCHER in the chair). Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. The amendment of the committee is, on page 13, on line 19, after the word "authorities," to strike out "$250,000" and to insert "$500,000: Provided, That hereafter the act approved May 29, 1884 (23 Stat. L., p. 31), be, and the same is hereby, amended to permit cattle which have reacted to the tuberculin test to be shipped, transported, or moved from one State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, to any other State, Territory, or the District of Columbia for immediate slaughter in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture," so that, if amended, the paragraph will read:

For investigating the disease of tuberculosis of animals, for its control and eradication, for the tuberculin testing of animals, and for researches concerning the cause of the disease, its modes of spread, and methods of treatment and prevention, including demonstrations, the formation of organizations, and such other means as may be necessary, either independently or in cooperation with farmers, associations, State or county authorities, $500,000: Provided, That hereafter the act approved May 29, 1884 (23 Stat. L., p. 31), be, and the same is hereby, amended to permit cattle which have reacted to the tuberculin test to be shipped, transported, or moved from one State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to any other State, Territory, or the District of Columbia for immediate slaughter, in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee. This is an amendment which was offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. I was, however, in favor of increasing this amount to $750,000. That amendment was proposed by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I shall not, of course, now attempt to further increase the appropriation, but I wish only to say that there never was a time when this country was in need of meat and of beef as much as it is to-day, and when we realize, as has been stated by the Secretary of Agriculture, that it has been estimated we are losing $25,000,000 worth of meat by this tubercular disease it seems to me it would be well to appropriate at least $1,000,000.

While I am on my feet I wish to ask the chairman of the committee if he has any objection to striking out the amendment which the committee proposed, limiting the shipment of tubercular cattle to immediate slaughter?

Mr. GORE. I would not object to striking out the words "immediate slaughter."

Mr. GRONNA. I was going to suggest that the latter part of the amendment I believe takes care of the whole situation—"in accordance with rules and regulations transmitted by the Secretary of Agriculture." That gives the Secretary of Agriculture entire control, and it seems to me we can well afford to trust it to the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. GORE. Upon further investigation I am inclined to believe that the words "immediate slaughter" ought to be stricken out.

Mr. SMOOT. Before that is done I should like to have a little more information.

Mr. NORRIS. May I make a suggestion in regard to the parliamentary situation? The Secretary read it all as one amendment. As a matter of fact, there are two amendments, and it was so considered in the committee. I think the Chair stated that it was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was about to announce that the amendment was agreed to when the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] rose.

Mr. GRONNA. I have no objection to the first amendment. I am perfectly willing that the first amendment shall be adopted.

Mr. GORE. I think that would be better.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be divided, and the amendment proposing to increase the appropriation from $250,000 to $500,000 will be agreed to without objection.

Mr. GRONNA. I move to strike out——

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator wait a moment until I offer an amendment which may meet the point, and then the Senator can go on with his remarks?

Mr. GRONNA. I will be glad to hear the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment just agreed to—that is, after the numerals $500,000—insert the following proviso:

Provided, however, That if in carrying out the purpose of this appropriation destruction of tuberculous animals becomes necessary, there may be paid from this appropriation not more than one-third the net loss to the owner, and in no event shall there be paid more than $20 for any grade or $50 for any pure-bred animal so destroyed, or a greater sum than shall be paid by the cooperating State or municipality.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May the last paragraph be read again? This is exceedingly important legislation.

The Secretary again read Mr. WARREN's amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming, first, what is the law now in relation to paying for cattle which may be affected by tuberculosis?

Mr. WARREN. I do not know of any specific law regarding payments for stock killed on account of tuberculosis, but the Government has provided payment for stock killed because of other diseases.

Mr. SMOOT. Has the Government in the past paid for it?

Mr. WARREN. The Government has in cases of the foot-and-mouth disease adopted similar legislation and paid a third to a half of the value of the cattle killed.

Mr. SMOOT. Has the Government ever paid in the past for tubercular cattle that may be killed upon the order of the Government?

Mr. WARREN. I think so. The States themselves have usually provided a part, as this amendment proposes, the Government paying the expenses and some proportion of the value of the animals killed.

Mr. SMOOT. Then this is imposing an additional burden upon the Government of the United States.

Mr. WARREN. The facts are as follows: We want to appropriate money to arrest and stamp out tuberculosis wherever it may be. This mainly is for the reactionists, for those that have had the tuberculin test applied and have reacted. We provide in another amendment which the department has asked for, and which the Senator from North Dakota may move to strike out, that these cattle can be shipped across State lines, which they can not do under the present law, provided they are consigned for immediate slaughter. For instance, Utah or Wyoming may ship to the market at Omaha, if it is for slaughter.

The destruction of tuberculosis which would be taken care of by the Government is in isolated cases. For instance, in a dairy where it is discovered that there may be only one or two animals that are past the point where they can be shipped for meat slaughter, those one or two or more can be immediately destroyed, and the Government will pay its part of it, one-third of the value.

Mr. SMOOT. In the past the State has always paid for cattle killed within the State?

Mr. WARREN. No; they have not always done so.

Mr. SMOOT. I mean it was supposed they would.

Mr. WARREN. Some of the States have provided fully and some have not.

Mr. GORE. This is not to be available in any State where the local authorities may make any provision for it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is no such provision in the amendment.

Mr. GORE. It says it shall not exceed the amount paid by the local authorities.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That does not prevent their paying.

Mr. GORE. If they pay nothing, then the Government pays nothing.

Mr. WARREN. This is not a matter that I care to impress unduly upon the Senate. If under this appropriation we leave it to the Government and we meet the losses of this kind, of course we can still perhaps take care of it in the western country as they have done in some parts of the East. The trouble with tuberculosis is mainly in the dairies. I think myself the amendment is one that will cost the Government a very trifling sum, but it does insure a sum on which they can immediately act in case tuberculosis is discovered in a very advanced stage.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not believe we ought to pass legislation now imposing on the Government of the United States an expense that they have never yet assumed. It seems to me it should be paid by the State itself. If this amendment is adopted, I think the result will be that wherever there is a tubercular animal, I care not in what State it may be, the Government of the United States will have to pay at least $20 if a common cow or calf or steer, but if it is an improved animal the Government will have to pay not to exceed $50.

Mr. WARREN. It is much the same as in the case of the foot-and-mouth disease, no more and no less.

Mr. GORE. I think the Senator from Wyoming is mistaken about that. I think the foot-and-mouth diseases proceeded on the "fifty-fifty" ratio.

Mr. WARREN. It is the same system; but the Government was more liberal than in this proposal.

Mr. GORE. This contemplates that the State or municipality will meet one-third of the loss, the Federal Government one-third of the loss, and the individual owner of the stock slaughtered will sustain one-third of the loss, and as an additional limitation in no case shall it exceed $20 for grade or $50 for a pure-bred animal. I call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the further fact that it does not relate to the amount of appropriation at all.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, it does not relate to the amount of appropriation, but it will have to be paid by the Government of the United States, no matter what it amounts to.

Mr. GORE. And none will be paid in States where no provision is made to meet any part of the expenses.

Mr. WARREN. Under the regulation of the Agriculture Department it never has been paid except where the States share the loss.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask the Senator from Oklahoma if he understands that the Federal Government to-day is authorized to kill tuberculous cattle without the consent of the owner?

Mr. GORE. I am not able to answer the question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think not.

Mr. GORE. I think not, myself.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They may do it with the consent of the owners or they may invoke the law of the State in which they are cooperating where the State law may authorize the State to kill the animal, not the Federal Government.

Mr. GORE. I think the Federal statute relates to interstate shipments.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The point I am endeavoring to bring out is that the Federal Government, not being clothed with the power to do as it pleases, is yet compelled by this suggestion to pay the money for what somebody else desires to have done.

Mr. WARREN. Except that the State pays its share, of course.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not entirely certain about the last clause of the proviso.

Mr. WARREN. If the amendment does not cover that, I desire that it shall do so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I would like the Secretary to read it again. This is a very important question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Wyoming will be again read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, however, That if in carrying out the purpose of this appropriation destruction of tuberculous animals becomes necessary there may be paid from this appropriation not more than one-third the net loss to the owner and in no event shall there be paid more than $20 for any grade or $50 for any pure-bred animal so destroyed, or a greater sum than shall be paid by the cooperating State or municipality.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The amendment forbids the payment of a sum greater than that paid by the cooperating State. Now, the State of New York pays for animals killed on the order of the State department of agriculture. My recollection is that they can pay as high as $100 for a registered dairy cow.

Mr. WARREN. Under the State law.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And under this amendment the Federal Government may pay another $50. There is no question about it. Is not that the understanding of the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I feel sure that no practice of that sort would prevail under this provision. I take it that it would be administered a good deal like the taking and slaughtering under the foot-and-mouth disease appropriation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. As I recollect that appropriation there was a specific provision that there should be a definite amount paid.

Mr. GORE. No; I think not, but that was the practice which prevailed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. At least the Federal Government had a right to kill the animal on its own motion.

Mr. GORE. No; I do not think so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. This legislation does not give the Federal Government that right?

Mr. GORE. I do not think that gave the Federal Government the right to slaughter the animals. In fact I do not think that this could.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Under what authority did they slaughter them?

Mr. GORE. I think this is essential to the eradication of tuberculosis among animals. The reason it has persisted so long is the fact that the Federal Government has not had power to make this arrangement. It is the opinion of experts that this would arrest the progress of the disease and I think at present we ought to be more generous and more insistent that the disease be eradicated.

I send to the desk and ask to have read a telegram from the president of the Live Stock Exchange of Chicago which illustrates the importance of the subject by those more familiar with it. It is believed that legislation of this sort is necessary for the eradication of the disease itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma desires to have the telegram read?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNION STOCK YARDS, ILL., February 16, 1918.

Senator THOMAS P. GORE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Wire received. Records of Government meat inspection show that out of total of 40,000,000 hogs slaughtered under Federal inspection in the United States last year 10 per cent were found affected with tuberculosis. It comes from infected cattle, either through milk or dropping. Losses from tuberculosis more than all other diseases combined, approximately $30,000,000 annually. Enormous waste of meat condemned as inedible. Urge appropriation of $1,000,000 so Department of Agriculture can indemnify owners of cattle which react to tuberculosis test in those States which will cooperate by appropriating additional funds. Tuberculosis among cattle in the District of Columbia reduced from 18.8 per cent to less than 1 per cent by tuberculosis testing and payment of indemnity by Department of Agriculture. Similar results can be had in all States, and the general feeling among stockmen and legislators of these Middle West States is that the States will make liberal appropriations if Congress will take the initiative in providing indemnity. Tuberculosis is our biggest conservation problem, discouraging increased production of meat and milk. Tuberculin testing of cattle and partial indemnity to owners of reacting cattle slaughtered is only way by which rapid progress can be made in eradicating this disease. Our committee will come to Washington if needed.

CHICAGO LIVE STOCK EXCHANGE,
By EVERETT C. BROWN, President.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am not out of sympathy with the object of this amendment and not in the slightest degree with the object of this legislation generally. I have seen the ravages of tuberculosis among dairy cattle in the State of New York. That State embarked several years ago on the problem of eradicating it. It has established a thorough system of compensation for the cattle that are killed on the order of the inspectors of the State department of agriculture.

My contention is with respect to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming, that while it seeks to place a limit which the Federal Government shall pay from its Treasury for the destruction of grade cattle and registered cattle, it does not attempt to place any limit upon that payment when combined with the payment made by the State. The closing sentence of the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming recites that the Federal Government shall not pay a sum greater than the sum paid by the cooperating State.

Mr. GORE. That point ought to be met, and I would be glad if the Senator would offer an amendment.

Mr. WARREN. The amendment has been offered on the assumption that no States were paying in full; and I know of none except New York, and that New York is doing it I am very glad. I congratulate the Senator upon his State having taken it up so thoroughly, but is he aware of any other State that has the same law and pays in full?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not positive, but I think Massachusetts pays liberally and I think Pennsylvania pays liberally.

Mr. GORE. That point can be easily met if the Senator thinks there would be an overpayment by the Federal Government.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will state to the Senator from Wyoming that I am quite sure the State of New Hampshire does pay a portion, I think 40 per cent, of the value of the stock.

Mr. WARREN. Without regard to the United States Government?

Mr. GALLINGER. Without regard to the United States Government. I think that the point that the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] has made is a very good one, and it ought to be guarded against so that the payments may not be duplicated.

Mr. WARREN. I agree and I have no objection whatever to that; but the telegrams and letters which I have had from great cattle States, like Iowa and other similar States, have sought to bring about an amendment whereby the State would pay a third, the owner stand for a third, and the United States pay a third. I should be glad to have the amendment so framed that it may cover and protect the States generally, if the Senator knows what States should be covered.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, it is rather difficult to introduce or to suggest an appropriate amendment.

Mr. WARREN. I suggest that the matter go into conference, where it can be properly shaped.

Mr. GORE. I suggest that the amendment be passed over for the present. If the Senator from New York desires that the amendment be framed on the theory that one-third of the total loss shall be devolved on the owner of the stock, of course it would be well enough to safeguard the possibility of making excessive payments. It seems to me there should be a proviso that in any case the payment should be by the Federal Government, except one-third of the actual loss, and that in no case should the aggregate payment made exceed the loss.

Mr. WARREN. Let me ask the chairman of the committee a question: Would it not be better to let the matter be voted on and go into the bill, if it can be so ordered, and then take the subject before it goes to conference and provide against what the Senator from New York has brought to our attention?

Mr. GORE. I suggest that the amendment be passed over, and that the Senator from New York offer his amendment when the bill comes into the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think the wiser course is to pass the matter over for the present and let those of us who want to look into it have an opportunity to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present order, the Chair understands, is that the Senate is first considering committee amendments. This is not a committee amendment, and the regular order is to first dispose of committee amendments.

Mr. GORE. Then I ask that this amendment be passed over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over. The Senate will proceed with the consideration of committee amendments. The next committee amendment will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 13, line 19, after the word "authorities," to strike out "$250,000" and to insert "$500,000: Provided, That hereafter the act approved May 29, 1884 (23 Stat. L., p. 31), be, and the same is hereby, amended to permit cattle which have reacted to the tuberculin test to be shipped, transported, or moved from one State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to any other State, Territory, or the District of Columbia for immediate slaughter, in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture," so as to make the clause read:

> For investigating the disease of tuberculosis of animals, for its control and eradication, for the tuberculin testing of animals, and for researches concerning the cause of the disease, its modes of spread, and method of treatment and prevention, including demonstrations, the formation of organizations, and such other means as may be necessary, either independently or in cooperation with farmers, associations, State or county authorities, $500,000: Provided, That hereafter the act approved May 29, 1884 (23 Stat. L., p. 31), be, and the same is hereby, amended to permit cattle which have reacted to the tuberculin test to be shipped, transported, or moved from one State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to any other State, Territory, or the District of Columbia for immediate slaughter, in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, as I understand, the chairman of the committee has no objection to striking out the words "for immediate slaughter."

Mr. GORE. I have no objection to that. I rather think it ought to be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota make that motion?

Mr. GRONNA. At the top of page 14, line 1, in the committee amendment, I move to strike out the words "for immediate slaughter."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator having the bill in charge if cattle which have reacted to the tuberculin test are sound cattle in every respect, and whether or not they could be used as milch cows with safety to the public health?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I would say that about 80 per cent of the reactors are used as human food.

Mr. NORRIS. But not for milk?

Mr. GORE. Not for milk, I think.

Mr. SMOOT. That was my question. They are never used for milk purposes, are they?

Mr. GORE. I would not want to give a categorical answer to that question.

Mr. SMOOT. But generally they are not so used?

Mr. GORE. No; I think not.

Mr. SMOOT. I have understood that such use would be unsafe. Mr. President, if we strike out the words "for immediate slaughter," then there will be nothing in the bill to prevent such tubercular cattle from being shipped into any part of the United States.

Mr. GORE. The Senator will observe that the language used is "in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture."

Mr. SMOOT. But that applies only to shipments.

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMOOT. And the Secretary of Agriculture may say that such cattle should be shipped in a car by themselves; he may say that they can only be shipped upon certain trains running on certain days in the week, and so forth; but there is nothing to prevent such cattle being shipped into any State in the Union where they may be sold to any person and used by any person for milk purposes.

Mr. GORE. I would say as to the history of this amendment that it was prepared by the Department of Agriculture and sent to the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. It has, I think, the approval of the stock-breeding associations of the country. As the amendment was prepared and sent to me it did not contain the words "for immediate slaughter," but when the committee came to consider it they decided to insert those words out of an abundance of caution and in anticipation of such results as the Senator indicates. The Department of Agriculture, however, expressed the opinion that the words ought not to be inserted, for this reason: As I have said, 80 per cent of these cattle are still available for human food. It is suggested—and it seems to be a very forcible suggestion—that if the words "for immediate slaughter" are retained in the amendment, then the situation will be turned over to the packers, and they can probably dictate and control the price, because the cattle can not be held by the feeders for any length of time but would have to be sold immediately. It would, therefore, subject the owners of cattle to further control and combination on the part of the packing houses.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I believe that the owner of a tubercular cow ought to keep that cow until it is to be sold for slaughter. I do not think such cows should be sold indiscriminately to anybody anywhere in the United States.

Mr. GORE. This does not affect that situation at all. It does not affect the availability of these cattle for slaughter at all. The illustration used by the department as they look upon this subject is that, for instance in the State of Iowa, cattle just across the Missouri River from Omaha may be in this position: They could not be shipped 1 mile to a packing house in Omaha but they must be shipped to Des Moines or to some other point in Iowa for slaughter.

Now, as to the availability of cattle for slaughter, this provision makes no difference whatever. It simply provides that in that sort of case the owner of cattle could ship to Omaha and not be subjected to the loss which would result from paying freight for a longer shipment.

Mr. SMOOT. But, Mr. President, I am not trying to interfere at all with the shipment of these cattle from one State to another.

Mr. GORE. But that is all this provision proposes to do.

Mr. SMOOT. No; but I do think, if such cattle are to be shipped from one State to another, they ought to be shipped for immediate slaughter; and if not shipped for immediate slaughter, then a cow could be shipped from one State to another and from that State to another and sold to an innocent purchaser, he never knowing at all that she had been diseased in any way, and she might be innocently used for the purpose of producing milk for the family of such a person.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, if there is any objection to that, I will say that a similar situation now prevails in Texas, which is larger than either France or Germany. Such cattle are now shipped from one point to another, and not for immediate slaughter.

Mr. SMOOT. But Texas is the only State in the Union as to which that is true.

Mr. GORE. That is true as to any State in the Union, so far as the Federal Government is concerned. Take Iowa. Cows may be shipped from the neighborhood of Des Moines to the northeastern part of Iowa. This simply saves the owners of stock the loss resulting from long shipments. They do not have to ship them now from point to point in the State for "immediate slaughter."

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but that is within the State, and this provision widens the scope so that they may be shipped all over the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have a good deal of sympathy with the argument the Senator is making, and it seems to me there is something in it. At the same time I can see that it might be a hardship to require immediate slaughter. As the chairman of the committee has said, it would force a man to sell immediately and would place him, perhaps, at the mercy of the packing interests, when it might be desirable for him to hold the cattle for a few days, to feed them, or something of that kind.

I should like to have the attention of the Senator from North Dakota to the suggestion I am about to make, as he has made the motion to strike out. Would not the result be accomplished, and would it not meet all the requirements of the situation if, instead of of striking out the words "for immediate slaughter," we should strike out the word "immediate." Then it would permit the shipment for slaughter and would obviate the objection the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] makes, that diseased cattle might be shipped in interstate commerce and the milk produced by them then be used.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to go on for just a moment. The adoption of the amendment I have suggested would permit the department to make regulations by which the shipper of the stock would not be required to offer his stock for immediate sale, but it would not permit the shipment of the stock if the milk of the animal was to be used. Would not that meet the entire situation?

Mr. GRONNA. No, Mr. President; that would not meet the entire situation; but I am perfectly willing for the present to withdraw my amendment, and I shall take it up again later on.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator withdraws his amendment, I desire to make a motion to strike out the word "immediate."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, so far as the motion of the Senator from Nebraska is concerned, its adoption will obviate the objection which I have, and I shall then be perfectly willing that the amendment be agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. I think that it would accomplish all the other suggestion seeks to accomplish.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] withdraws his amendment and the Senator from Nebraska offers an amendment to strike out the word "immediate." The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 14, line 1, before the word "slaughter," it is proposed to amend the committee amendment by striking out the word "immediate."

Mr. GRONNA. I prefer, rather than to have that word stricken out, that the amendment go over.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to that; that is perfectly satisfactory to me.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the amendment go over, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over. The next amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 14, line 4, after the words "cattle ticks," to strike out "$620,420" and insert "$750,000," so as to read:

For all necessary expenses for the eradication of southern cattle ticks, $750,000, of which sum $50,000 may be used for live stock and dairy demonstration work, in cooperation with the States Relations Service, and of this amount no part shall be used in the purchase of animals.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the chairman of the committee if there is a recommendation for an increase of this appropriation? There appears to be a very specific amount named in the bill as it came from the House. It is $620,420, and it is proposed by the Senate committee to make the amount an even $750,000.

Mr. GORE. I will say that there has not been a specific recommendation upon this subject.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I either want the amendment passed over or I will make a point of order that it makes an increased appropriation which has not been recommended. On second thought, however, the amendment having been reported by the committee, perhaps a point of order will not lie.

Mr. GORE. I think that would save the point of order. If the Senator desires, I have no objection to the amendment going over; but I do not think it would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it had better go over. This is a pretty large appropriation, and it is one of the appropriations we are constantly increasing year by year. Whether this trouble, or whatever it may be called, is becoming more and more serious, I do not know.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will say that the work of the Federal Government is entirely in conjunction with that of the States and local authorities.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. GORE. They are required to put up dollar for dollar. The record of the results obtained, I think, is remarkable.

Mr. GALLINGER. So that if we should allow the appropriation to stand as it comes from the House, there will be over $800,000 available for the work of eradicating the cattle tick.

Mr. SMOOT. The amount would be over a million dollars.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; the amount will be over a million dollars. I was thinking the amount appropriated by the House was $420,000, but it is over $620,000, and if the State and local authorities contribute an equal amount, the total will be nearly $1,300,000.

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that they are just gradually driving the tick toward the ocean. A large section of territory has been freed from the presence of the tick. By the system employed of dipping in vats and washing cattle with the character of chemicals necessary, the tick is being gradually eradicated, and as the process goes on the tick will be entirely eradicated in time.

Mr. GORE. The record of the progress of this work has been most remarkable.

Mr. GALLINGER. They may drive the tick into the ocean, I presume.

Mr. GORE. We all hope so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It should be driven into the ocean.

Mr. GALLINGER. As was done in the case of a certain other plague in the Scriptures.

Mr. GORE. I am quite sure nobody would rejoice more than the Senator from New Hampshire if the work were successfully completed. It has been a most remarkable record. We have rescued 379,000 square miles from the domination of the tick. There still remain, however, 349,000 square miles subject to its ravages. Seventy thousand square miles were rescued last year. The department says that it is really a matter of available funds and that they can expand their organization to the limit simply by the cooperation of the local authorities.

Mr. GALLINGER. If I may ask the Senator a question, the department I apprehend recognized that the amount that is now in the bill as it came from the House was sufficient, and they did not ask to be given any larger amount?

Mr. GORE. Yes. Of course the department has to balance these various appropriations for various purposes. The committee, however, realized the importance of this work, and the fact that it was merely a matter of time and money, there being no doubt that the tick can be entirely eradicated from the United States, and we thought that under existing circumstances it was a matter of wisdom and of conservation to increase this appropriation in order to facilitate this work.

It is a matter serviceable to all sections of the country. Breeders are shipped from the North into the South, and when the territory is rid of these ticks feeders are shipped from the rescued territory in the South to parts of the North for feeding. It is of double service; and no argument against it can be made, except the one of general economy; but it seems to me that it would be very short-sighted economy in this situation to withhold an appropriation of this character, simply tolerating the tick, rather than getting rid of it, and realizing the benefits that may come from its eradication, because wherever territory is rescued there is a great stimulus to cattle breeding. I may say that the State of Mississippi is now entirely out from under quarantine.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator kindly state what territory is still infected?

Mr. GORE. I think that parts of Florida, Georgia, South Carolina, Louisiana, and Texas are still infected.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not going to be factious about this at all, but the point is that the extent of the infected territory is lessening, while the appropriation grows larger year by year.

Mr. GORE. That is true; it is merely a matter of speed; that is all.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me in this connection, I want to call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to the fact that there is a good deal of skepticism in the efficacy of and opposition to the work of cattle dipping and employing vats for that purpose. Four years ago, however, officers came to my farm, which was infected with the Texas fever tick, and began their operations, and in two years they had my entire place freed from the tick.

The peculiar biology of this little insect is that he does not go over a space of 2 feet. When the tick that propagates the little tick drops from the cattle, it then propagates millions of the species. They are very small insects, called "seed ticks," and the cattle in moving over them pick them up by coming in contact with the little twigs or whatever the little colonies of ticks may cling to. If they can be kept from propagating on a given piece of ground for one year, that piece of ground will be entirely immune, provided a tick infested cow or animal is not allowed to come on that land any more. Now, when you get rid of them it is permanent. The reason why we have suggested this larger amount was that since we have the force educated and know the territory, in place of spreading it out over these years, in a short time we can eradicate the pest from the whole tick-infested region of this country, and there will not be any danger of reinfection.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; but upon the theory of the Senator from South Carolina we ought to make this appropriation five or ten million, so as to try to clean up the job in one year.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If we had the force ready to do it, I would be in favor of making it five million to finish it.

Mr. GORE. By all means.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must suggest that Senators address the Chair, because otherwise the Chair can not tell whom to recognize.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor. The Senator from North Dakota has requested a number of times the privilege of interrupting.

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Oklahoma have really explained what I was going to explain to the Senator from New Hampshire. I want to say that the committee was convinced that it was in the interest of economy to appropriate a larger amount, and I am quite sure that this money can be expended with splendid success. The Agricultural Department have done most wonderful work in the eradication of ticks, and as long as they have the force to do the work I believe we ought to be liberal in the appropriation for this purpose.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Florida. I am seeking light on this important subject.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know that I can be of any assistance, but perhaps I can in this way—that I know that this plan is successfully operating in Florida. At first there was a disposition to resist interference by the Federal Government, and a great many of the cattle growers were disposed to say, "We do not like to have our business interfered with at all; we propose to handle this thing ourselves." But it has been so thoroughly demonstrated to the people of the State that the plan is absolutely successful—there is no theory about it; there is no guess about it at all; they clean up the tick wherever they dip the cattle—that now the people have become thoroughly sympathetic with it and are cooperating with the Federal Government, and the tick is being absolutely eliminated from portions of the State wherever they are putting it in practice, and they are doing it rapidly.

For instance, they have demonstrated it at the country fairs, and now at the State fair at Jacksonville. They have a vat there, and they actually bring in the cattle and put them through this dipping process. The people are shown the results, and, as I say, there is no longer objection to it on the part of the people, and there is not any question at all about its effect. So that it is just a question of spending enough money to carry on the work as rapidly as the department can carry it on, because no one will deny that it is a splendid work, and the effect of it is to increase very greatly not only the size of the cattle but the cattle industry itself.

I hope the Senator will not object to this amendment, because whereas a few years ago they might have not been able to utilize as much of an appropriation as they can utilize now, there is not any doubt but that their forces are thoroughly organized, the plant is thoroughly demonstrated to be a success, and the people are cooperating. It is just a question of pushing it on to completion; that is all.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I should like to remind the Senator of a little piece of history in connection with the first legislation on this subject. It became a law in June, 1906. Mr. Wilson was then Secretary of Agriculture. He had studied this subject very carefully, and I remember an address he made before the Committee on Agriculture of the House. He said at that time that if Congress would give him enough money he would very speedily drive the cattle tick into the Gulf of Mexico; that it would take a considerable amount of money; that the cattle tick was at that time costing the Government nationally between seventy-five and one hundred million dollars every year. It is a very expensive proposition to the Nation to allow the cattle tick to go ahead with its ravages.

That was nearly 12 years ago. As stated by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the tick has been eradicated from a very large portion of the South; but it still exists in many portions, and it is quite a difficult problem. I raise a few cattle myself, and I know that on my plantation for the past three years we have been religiously dipping the cattle and doing our utmost to eradicate the ticks; but, unfortunately, that is a largely wooded area. Only a small percentage of the land in my portion of Louisiana is cultivated, and it is thought that these ticks get on the deer and other wild animals. At any rate, we have not been able to entirely free East Carroll Parish, where I live, from the tick, in spite of the fact that we have done everything that was humanly possible for three years. The people in the adjoining parish did not make the same attempts that we did. They did not have the dipping vats and they did not try to eradicate the tick, and the cattle would move from one place to the other in this big, continuous forest; but at the last session of the legislature in Louisiana stringent laws were passed making it obligatory on every community to eradicate the ticks.

I will say that the dipping vats are constructed by the local communities. The Government does not contribute for that purpose. It is done locally, and the people are most enthusiastic and earnest in their endeavors and their determination to get rid of the tick. As one result in my community, let me say that some cotton plantations there which could not make anything at all in cotton have gone into cattle raising. There is one plantation near me where there are 3,500 head of cattle which have been brought in from the north and west. The good varieties of cattle have been bought, as I understand, largely in Missouri, and I have no doubt they have come in from Iowa and other parts of the West. Hundreds of fine bulls were brought into that community and the people are beginning to increase the grade of their stock there very much. Formerly if you would bring in these fine animals they would die with the Texas fever, and there was no inducement to bring them in; the loss was too great. Now we are protecting our animals and we are increasing the grade very, very rapidly, with the result that I think there is a strong hope of increasing the national supply of livestock from the South so much as to give us cheaper meat; and that certainly is something in which we are all very much interested.

I know that in my State every effort is being made to eradicate these ticks. I know it is said that in Mississippi the people have been successful, and Mississippi is practically free from the tick. The papers last fall stated that they were having a big celebration in Mississippi of the complete eradication of the cattle tick from that State. I understand that the whole State was to come out from under the cattle-tick quarantine on the 1st of January, and they are raising many fine cattle there. It is certainly a matter of the greatest national importance, and I hope the Senator will not insist on his motion to strike out this amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have not made any motion. I am not going to make any motion. I have been seeking light, and I have received some light and some darkness as a result. The suggestion that we are going to have cheaper meat is so often made that it has failed to produce much impression on my mind. I think it is a delusion and a snare.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will say to the Senator that we will probably have more. Whether it will be any cheaper or not I can not say.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is the cheapness to which I am addressing myself. My impression is that the more we get the higher the price will be.

But however that may be, Mr. President, I am not opposing this amendment. I was asking some questions about it. I am so deeply impressed with the feeling—and perhaps I ought not to be, because I belong to the minority of this body, and the responsibility of making the appropriations is upon the other side of the Chamber—I am so deeply impressed with the feeling that we are going recklessly along, appropriating the money of the taxpayers of the country, that I had hoped there would be some effort at economy at some point in our proceedings.

I have just come from a committee that considered a bill that came over from the House. The committee added only $73,000,000 to it in addition to what the House appropriated. I presume it is necessary, and I am not going to criticize the additions that were made to that bill, although there was a time when it would have startled every one of us and would have startled the country, and there would have been a protest against it that would have been heard around the world. But now it does not disturb us at all to add half a million or a million dollars, or $10,000,000 for that matter, to any bill that we may have under consideration.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a suggestion?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. We added only $1,115,160 to the House agricultural bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, I know; but $1,000,000 used to trouble us somewhat. It does not now, because we are dealing in billions nowadays; and I have observed this in connection with the Agricultural appropriation bill: We put an item in the bill to cure some evil connected with the live stock of the country, and the next year it is increased, and the next it is further increased, and it goes along until we lose all interest in it and pay no attention to it. I just thought that it might be well for us to look at this a few minutes, and see whether it is absolutely essential that this added appropriation should be made.

The Agricultural Department is very apt to suggest a sum large enough to meet emergencies, and they recommended certainly not more than the sum that was in the bill as it came from the House of Representatives, and without any suggestion from the department the committee think that they had better add a hundred or a hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars to it. It is not much, and there is an emergency existing, so it is said, and we are supposed to vote for it without giving it any special consideration.

As far as I am concerned, I am not going to make any factious opposition to this thing. I am quite willing that it should be voted on at this very moment. I shall vote against it, because I am getting anxious about the Democratic majority in this matter of appropriations. I am afraid that they are going at a rate that will be very troublesome to them in the near future, and I want to save them from their own indiscretions as far as I can. That was the feeling I had when I occupied a good deal of time in debate on a certain river and harbor bill not long ago; and while I have never advertised it to anybody, it was a great gratification to me that the minority did save thirty millions on that bill, and it did not do any harm. If we can save a hundred thousand dollars in this bill, I think it will be worth trying for; but I am not going to take up the time of the Senate. I am quite ready to vote on the proposition.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, like the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], I have tried on one or two occasions to limit the appropriations in the agricultural bill; but the only success—if success it may be called—that has thus far attended my efforts has been the adoption of every appropriation that I have opposed. Consequently, I have come to the conclusion that the only headway I can make, in view of my past experiences, toward reducing them is to advocate the bill, or to suggest their enlargement.

Now, the cow tick is a very insidious and pernicious little insect. It interferes with the growth and prosperity of live stock, and particularly of cattle, and it should be exterminated; but it would seem that we are not making much headway in that direction, or that of the various other insects so long sheltered under the ægis of the agricultural appropriation bill. Indeed, the cow tick seems to thrive in proportion as our appropriations to extinguish it increase. It not only holds the trenches all the time, but frequently comes over the top; and whenever that occurs we cheerfully increase the appropriation, and so it goes with the others. The increase of cow ticks and the increase of appropriations to head them off are much like increasing salaries that employees may overcome the high cost of living. But the "H. C. of L." has better facilities for climbing than the salary enjoys. To keep pace with it is impossible.

Therefore, this bill should embrace something more than cow ticks. We should extend the appropriation to enable the department to investigate bedticks as well. They are the origin and the lair of a number of very pernicious insects, whose activities seriously decrease the efficiency of labor; and inasmuch as we can strike at the source of their creation, and possibly cut them off in their youth, why not make an appropriation not only for the investigation of bedticks as well as cow ticks, but also create a bureau to investigate the anatomy, the physiology, and the habits of the flea, the louse, and the nit? [Laughter.] I think it is very important, Mr. President, if we are to develop our economic productivity to the highest possible point of efficiency during the war.

Mr. WADSWORTH. These are war measures?

Mr. THOMAS. This is decidedly a war measure, and I think I can demonstrate it. Mr. President, no man can be as efficient when his body is infested with the louse or with the flea as when he is free from those parasites. They work while he sleeps [laughter], and the victim of their toil must necessarily scratch whenever the industry of the parasite becomes serious and irritating; and if accurate time were kept of every such interruption of the activities of the individual it would show that a man so unfortunately infested loses probably 30 per cent of his efficiency.

There is another standpoint from which this subject may be considered. I have said that these pestiferous insects never stop their activities. They work all the time and overtime; and, as a consequence, the activities of the individual to get rid of them, or at least to mitigate their disagreeable attention, tend to violate the eight-hour law. When a man is bitten by these insects, no matter whether he has worked eight hours or not, he must stop to relieve himself of their attentions; and that requires an expenditure of physical energy. So I am sure that we should also utilize this bill to work both ends of the line—the insects which attack crops, and those which attack those who plant and who reap them. By that means, Mr. President, we shall reach the point of complete efficiency, which some departments and bureaus would do well to imitate. I therefore suggest an increase of this appropriation, with a view to doing everything possible to win the war; and certainly if we can add to the efficiency of the farmer by relieving him of these pests and conserving all his time we ought to do it.

Now, the flea is perhaps the worst of these pests, because he is superactive and his powers of locomotion are so infinitely out of proportion to all the other representatives of the insect world that in all probability if we could provide funds for the study of the little beast we might discover some way of hamstringing him, and thus, if we can not rid ourselves of him we could reduce his activities to the "nth" power. [Laughter.]

The suggestion is well worthy of consideration. Perhaps the flea should deserve our special attention at this time if we can not cover them all, for they are the most irritating of all these pests. Moreover, they feed other parasites. I think Dean Swift once said:

> And little fleas have other fleas
> Upon their legs to bite 'em;
> And lesser fleas have other fleas,
> And so ad infinitum.

Therefore the annihilation of the little flea would necessarily annihilate those infinitely microscopic parasites which, the poet says, infest the larger insect and is infested in turn by others. So why, Mr. President, should we make several bites at the cherry?

We have the assurance of the distinguished Senator from Louisiana that the appropriations of this bill have been increased in the Senate by only $1,115,150. What are $1,115,000 between friends? I am surprised by the committee's exceptional conduct. I am really ashamed of this meanly modest showing. It is completely out of proportion to the magnitude of our other increases, to one of which the Senator from New Hampshire has just referred; and I have no doubt he feels, as to that increase of $73,000,000, that the committee making it could well say with Lord Clive that it is astonished at its own moderation.

Indeed, Mr. President, in these times any Senate increase of less than $100,000,000 is too trifling to arrest our attention; it amounts to nothing. I heard some time ago that the chairman of one of the House committees was visited by a constituent who had a tremendous scheme for relieving the Government which required an initial expenditure of $100,000,000. The Representative said: "Go and see my secretary; I am dealing in billions; he will attend to your trifling affair, no doubt. I am too busy with billions to consider it."

Seriously, Mr. President, we have reached and long ago passed the limit of appropriations designed to investigate and destroy certain insectiverous parasites which do very seriously interfere with the growth of plants and with the healthy increase of live stock, because we do not seem to get actual results. Whenever an item of this sort, however small and insignificant, is designed to meet, study, and, if possible, remove these little plagues, it becomes a greater source of legislative concern and is far more deadly to the Treasury of the United States than the pest is to the thing to which it relates.

I think I can say that, without exception, if a solitary pest has been destroyed by these means, if the amount needed for continuing the study of its habits, of chasing it from its lurking places, and killing it has ever been reduced in succeeding bills I ask the chairman to inform me what particular insect has been so unfortunate?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I would not undertake to enumerate the insects, but I would instance as an illustration of Government service of this character the eradication of the foot-and-mouth disease. It took $10,000,000 to do it, but it was cheap at that price. It would not have done at all to permit that worst of all animal maladies to range unbridled throughout the country.

Mr. THOMAS. Let met ask the Senator if the foot-and-mouth disease is caused by an insect or parasite?

Mr. GORE. It is a microbe; it is not an insect.

Mr. THOMAS. A microbe is perhaps too small to come under the provisions of a bill like this, except it be disguised under the cover of a disease.

Mr. GORE. The Senator, though, seems to have greater faith in his ability to prevail over it than over the insect. The smaller the enemy the more animated is his hostility.

Mr. THOMAS. The fundamental difference between the microbe and the tick is that you can extinguish the microbe if he exhibits himself in the shape of the foot-and-mouth disease, but the tick, like the poor, is with us forever; and so I may say of the cow tick, the boll weevil, and the gypsy moth, and the moth that has nothing to do with gypsies. These, Mr. President, are constantly occurring sources of appropriation from the Treasury. I am now advocating extensions of such appropriations. I may offer an amendment appropriating a certain sum of money—not a great deal—starting with only a few millions to the consideration of the matters to which I have called attention in the hope that by advocating the bill in that shape I may be able to defeat some of its more objectionable features.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question of the chairman of the committee. I was not present, although a member of the committee. I was ill at the time this appropriation was increased from $620,000 to $750,000. Is it not true that the Secretary of Agriculture made a very careful estimate of what he could profitably spend in the eradication of the cattle tick?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, of course we have to assume that the estimates of these items are made with more or less care, but I am pretty sure the attitude of the department is that the speed of exterminating the cattle tick is largely a matter of money and organization.

Mr. THOMAS. Particularly money.

Mr. GORE. Every dollar expended by the Federal Government is matched by a dollar expended by the State or local authorities. That is a perfect guaranty against extravagance. If the money can not be expended under those circumstances it will not be expended. It will lapse; it will return to the Treasury.

I wish to say, while I am on my feet, that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], who ordinarily has accurate information as to facts, in this instance is incorrectly advised when he assumes that the cattle tick is spreading. When this crusade was commenced there were 728,000 square miles infested and infected with ticks—larger than Germany, France, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Switzerland, Holland, and Denmark combined. I am satisfied that there is not a Government on this globe making any pretension to civilization that would tolerate a pest of this sort for one year if it were possible to exterminate it. It is merely a matter of time and money. It will be exterminated in time. We will appropriate the money in time to carry out this work. The only question is, Will we appropriate it in larger amounts and speed the day of extermination or spread it over a longer series of years? Now, that is the only question.

I suggested a few moments ago that 379,000 square miles have already been rid of the tick, and 349,000 square miles are still subject to its ravages. Seventy thousand square miles were released from quarantine last year. I reiterate the statement that the only question is as to whether wisdom would recommend that larger appropriations be made and the time of eradication be shortened in order that we may enjoy the larger benefits at an earlier date, or whether we shall procrastinate and project those benefits further into the future.

Mr. CURTIS. May I ask the chairman of the committee whether there was an unexpended balance last year, or was the appropriation last year expended? Has the Senator that information at hand?

Mr. GORE. I am advised there was no unexpended balance. There is no doubt that the amount would be expended. I will say this, not by way of criticism at all, I think that the opposition of Senators to appropriations is in inverse proportion to their amount. Some bill has been increased $73,000,000, and, as suggested by a Senator across the aisle, I apprehend the Senate will concur in the $73,000,000 increase in less minutes than are taken upon this item of the bill. I doubt if any measure could occupy as much time of the Senate as this particular amendment. As suggested by the Senator from Louisiana, we have increased the appropriation $1,100,000, with, I believe, only one exception. The amounts have been studiously limited to questions of production and conservation of food, an urgent and important question in peace times, but a matter of supreme importance in times of war. The fate of this war may depend even more than Senators realize upon an available food supply in the United States, and for this small amount we ought not to jeopardize the fullest possible service in that direction. I do not believe it is sound economy.

In the main I agree with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] in their efforts to maintain reasonable appropriations and to obviate unreasonable appropriations, but I think this appropriation comes in the former category and is in no sense unreasonable.

Mr. PAGE. May I ask the Senator one question at that point? Is it not true that there has been no estimate made showing that we need $130,000 more? Many seem to go on the simple principle that if $620,000 was good, $750,000 might be better, and we might just as well have gone on and increased the appropriation to $1,000,000.

Mr. GORE. The Senator was away for a few minutes. I have already stated that there was no estimate for this amount. The Senate Committee on Agriculture ventured to take one step forward, without being commanded to do it by some executive department of the Government. The committee has not abdicated either its appreciation of public questions or its devotion to the common good.

The Senate Committee on Agriculture, in the absence of the Senator from Vermont, thought if we could, by increasing this appropriation $130,000, speed the extermination of the cattle tick, if we could encourage the cattle business in this country, if we could provide larger supplies of cattle and of beef, not only for the civilian population and our own armies but for the civilian population and armies of our allies, we had rendered a service; and the fact that $130,000 is essential to that purpose did not deter the Senate Committee on Agriculture from venturing to submit such a recommendation to the Senate. It is, of course, a matter for the Senate entirely to determine whether the Committee on Agriculture outran either the propriety or the safe limitations upon public expenditures.

Mr. PAGE. I simply suggest, Mr. President, if I may be allowed, that it is quite common for the Committee on Agriculture to take the estimate of the Secretary of Agriculture and, without any showing whatever except the general claim, as it has been made by the Senator from Oklahoma this morning, that there is a great evil, and without any especial reason being given, without the facts or figures having been submitted, increase it by $130,000.

Mr. GORE. The Senator is aware, of course, that the Senate has already voted an increase of $250,000 to eradicate tuberculosis, an increase of 100 per cent upon the amount recommended by the Department of Agriculture. I think it a wise appropriation. It will be used to exterminate tuberculosis in every part of the United States where that disease prevails; and I think it would be a shortsighted, a niggardly sort of economy that would withhold a quarter million dollars in an effort to save an annual loss of $25,000,000 in the value of meat products. The loss used to be estimated from the cattle tick at $70,000,000. I believe it has now dropped to between $40,000,000 and $50,000,000. An increase of $130,000 to reinsure against a loss of $40,000,000 to $50,000,000 of foodstuffs when the world faces a crisis in foodstuffs is the act of boldness which the Committee on Agriculture has committed.

Mr. PAGE. Why not, on the same principle, may I ask the Senator from Oklahoma, increase this appropriation of $620,000 to $1,000,000?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, nothing that the Senate could do and nothing that it will do would afford a higher or more unmistakable proof of statesmanship than to make such an appropriation increasing this amount to $1,000,000. Nothing, I say, would betray symptoms of intelligent patriotism on the part of the Senate to a greater extent, except an appropriation of $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 or $4,000,000, or whatever amount it would take to rid this great country, professing to be enlightened and civilized, of this pest which costs $50,000,000 a year and places a limitation upon our food supplies.

Mr. President, there is no act which I would rather be the author of than an appropriation securing at one time a sufficient and a perpetual fund available until the tick is eradicated, so that the spectacle will not be exhibited every time the Agricultural appropriation bill comes up for consideration in the Senate that this very debate has to be gone through with, and have Senators sit here and pare cheese and nibble at cherries when the destiny of the Nation may be to a measurable extent affected by this measure. I think it is extremely short-sighted.

I do not mean to be critical when I say that we ought like a great Nation and like, I believe, any other nation on earth would do, make an appropriation to carry this work out and complete it. Say it will take $5,000,000 to do it and we extend the appropriations over 8 years We have been 12 years now. We will probably be 8 years more. It would have been wiser to have made the appropriation in the beginning and to have cleaned up the entire country by this time. We would not then in war times find in our country with 350,000 square miles subject to a pest which is eradicable and which places a limitation upon our food supplies.

Mr. PAGE I thank the Senator. The Secretary of Agriculture is a very good man; he has made his estimates as to what sums he can use properly and efficiently for the coming year. I do not know but that we might by adopting the theory which the Senator from Oklahoma has just expressed increase every one of these appropriations immensely to our advantage. So far as I am concerned I propose to vote against the amendment, because we have a man at the head of the department who has given the matter his careful consideration, and who says that $620,000 is what he can wisely and properly expend. We ought to stop there and not increase it by $130,000, without some facts or some figures or some data upon which to vote a larger sum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture was, on page 16, line 23, after the words "general expenses," to strike out "$2,743,098" and insert "$3,122,678," so as to make the clause read:

In all, for general expenses, $3,122,678.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, line 6, after the words "Animal Industry," to strike out "$3,700,008" and insert "$4,079,588," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Bureau of Animal Industry, $4,079,588.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, line 11, after the words "United States," to strike out "$85,510" and insert "$107,510," so as to read:

For acclimatization and adaptation investigations of cotton, corn, and other crops introduced from tropical regions, and for the improvement of cotton and other fiber plants by cultural methods, breeding, and selection, and for determining the feasibility of increasing the production of hard fibers outside of the continental United States, $107,510.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 23, line 18, after the word "production," to strike out "$241,505" and insert "$291,505"; and in line 21, after the word "That," to strike out "$50,000" and insert "$100,000," so as to make the clause read:

For the investigation and improvement of cereals and methods of cereal production and the study of cereal diseases, and for the investigation of the cultivation and breeding of flax for seed purposes, including a study of flax diseases, and for the investigation and improvement of broom corn and methods of broom-corn production, $291,505: Provided, That $40,000 shall be set aside for the study of corn improvement and methods of corn production: Provided also, That $100,000 shall be set aside for the investigation and control of the diseases of wheat, oats, and barley known as black rust and stripe rust, which sum shall be immediately available; Provided also, That $25,000 shall be set aside for the investigation of corn root and stalk diseases and for the inauguration of such control measures as may be found necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 19, after the words "general expenses," to strike out "$2,232,698" and insert "$2,304,698," so as to make the clause read:

In all, for general expenses, $2,304,698.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, after line 19, to strike out:

Purchase and distribution of valuable seeds: For purchase, propagation, testing, and congressional distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants; all necessary office fixtures and supplies, fuel, transportation, paper, twine, gum, postal cards, gas, electric current, rent outside of the District of Columbia, official traveling expenses and all necessary material and repairs for putting up and distributing the same; for repairs and the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $242,320. And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to expend the said sum, as nearly as practicable, in the purchase, testing, and distribution of such valuable seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, the best he can obtain at public or private sale, and such as shall be suitable for the respective localities to which the same are to be apportioned, and in which same are to be distributed as hereinafter stated, and such seeds so purchased shall include a variety of vegetable and flower seeds suitable for planting and culture in the various sections of the United States: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture, after due advertisement and on competitive bids, is authorized to award the contract for the supplying of printed packets and envelopes and the packeting, assembling, and mailing of the seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, or any part thereof, for a period of not more than five years nor less than one year, if by such action he can best protect the interests of the United States. An equal proportion of five-sixths of all seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants shall upon their requests, after due notification by the Secretary of Agriculture that the allotment to their respective districts is ready for distribution, be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution among their constituents, or mailed by the department upon the receipt of their addressed franks, in packages of such weight as the Secretary of Agriculture and the Postmaster General may jointly determine: Provided, however, That upon each envelope or wrapper containing packages of seeds the contents thereof shall be plainly indicated, and the Secretary shall not distribute to any Senator, Representative, or Delegate seeds entirely unfit for the climate and locality he represents, but shall distribute the same so that each Member may have seeds of equal value, as near as may be, and the best adapted to the locality he represents: Provided, also, That the seeds allotted to Senators and Representatives for distribution in the districts embraced within the twenty-fifth and thirty-fourth parallels of latitude shall be ready for delivery not later than the 10th day of January: Provided, also, That any portion of the allotments to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress remaining uncalled for on the 1st day of April shall be distributed by the Secretary of Agriculture, giving preference to those persons whose names and addresses have been furnished by Senators and Representatives in Congress and who have not before during the same season been supplied by the department: And provided, also, That the Secretary shall report, as provided in this act, the place, quantity, and price of seeds purchased, and the date of purchase; but nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to prevent the Secretary of Agriculture from sending seeds to those who apply for the same. And the amount herein appropriated shall not be diverted or used for any other purpose but for the purchase, testing, propagation, and distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, mulberry and other rare and valuable trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants.

And, on page 30, line 10, after the words "Plant Industry," to strike out "$2,915,038" and insert "$2,744,718," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Bureau of Plant Industry, $2,744,718.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the amendment may go over.

Mr. GORE. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will go over for the present.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Forest Service," on page 45, after line 17, to strike out:

That, during the existing state of war, the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to make sales, without advertisement, at a fair valuation, to be determined by him, of national forest timber which is to be used so far as suitable for the construction of aeroplanes.

And in lieu to insert:

That hereafter during the existing state of war, the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized under regulations to be prescribed by him, to permit the War Department, or any other department, board, or commission, of the Government, to take from the national forests such timber as may be needed in the prosecution of the war, and the Secretary of Agriculture is further authorized to sell, or otherwise dispose of, any timber necessarily cut in carrying out the provisions of this paragraph and any materials manufactured therefrom which are not necessary for war purposes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the chairman of the committee is absent for a few moments and in his absence he asked me to suggest an alteration in the amendment now before the Senate to conform to the suggestion made by a memorandum from the Forestry Bureau. I therefore move, on page 46, lines 3 and 4, that the words "the Secretary of Agriculture is further" be stricken out and to insert:

Secretaries of the departments, the boards, or the commissions which may obtain such timber are severally.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the amendment may be read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMPSON in the chair). The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], then, has the floor. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I merely want to say a word. I assume that the reason for suggesting this amendment is that the sale of this timber will come under various departments. The committee thought, of course, it would come under the Department of Agriculture, but I can readily see that the Secretary of the Interior may have something to say about the sale of some of this timber. I can see no other reason for the change.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not what the amendment provides for, I will say to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. It speaks of different departments.

Mr. SMOOT. It authorizes all of the departments or any of the departments.

Mr. GRONNA. It simply authorizes them to cooperate.

Mr. SMOOT. No; it authorizes them to sell the timber.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; on examination I see that is correct.

Mr. SMOOT. It authorizes any board that we create to sell this timber, and it authorizes any commission to sell the timber.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from Utah, of course, understands that this timber is simply for the purpose of constructing ships or aeroplanes; that it is absolutely for nothing else but for use in this war. This does not authorize anyone to sell any timber except what may be used in the construction of ships and aeroplanes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah understands that, because it is specifically so stated in the amendment. What I desired time for was merely to see what the amendment did provide, because a Senator can hardly ascertain that by the reading from the desk, and without reading it in connection with the amendment itself.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I can enlighten the Senator from Utah on that point.

Mr. SMOOT. After comparing the Senator's amendment with the amendment of the committee I see that his amendment is a wise one and I think it ought to be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 46, after line 7, to strike out:

Whenever, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the Secretary of Agriculture shall find that the expenses of travel can be reduced thereby, he may, in lieu of actual traveling expenses, under such regulations as he may prescribe, authorize the payment of not to exceed 2 cents per mile for a motorcycle or 6 cents per mile for an automobile, used for necessary travel on official business in the Forest Service: Provided, That there shall be no payment of mileage for the use or travel of motorcycle or automobile furnished or owned by or maintained by the Government of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator having the bill in charge if the provision proposed to be stricken out has not generally been in Agricultural appropriation bills and also in other appropriation bills?

Mr. RANSDELL. I understand that the department is anxious to have that provision, and that it has usually been in the bill, but in this case it is proposed to strike it out. I was not present in committee, I will say to the Senator from Utah, when that action was taken, and the Senator in charge of the bill has momentarily left the Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. I remember when the wording contained in this proviso of this bill was first placed in an appropriation bill; and, if I remember rightly, it has been generally in regular appropriation bills. It reads:

Provided, That there shall be no payment of mileage for the use or travel of motorcycle or automobile furnished or owned by or maintained by the Government of the United States.

The reason for inserting those words in previous appropriation bills, Mr. President, was because there had been claims for mileage and there had been payments for mileage, in which the persons claiming the mileage had used motorcycles and automobiles which had been furnished by the Government of the United States. The claim for such mileage was unfair to the Government and should never have been allowed. I have, therefore, wondered why the committee proposed to strike this provision out of the bill.

Mr. RANSDELL. I can not give an explanation of that, and I will suggest to the Senator from Utah, if he desires such explanation, that the amendment be passed over until the chairman of the committee returns.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have some explanation of that matter, and so I ask that the amendment go over until the chairman of the committee returns.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, under the subhead "Bureau of Soils," on page 54, line 9, after "$217,600," to insert:

Provided That the product obtained from such experimentation may be sold at a price to be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture, and the amount obtained from the sale thereof shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

So as to make the clause read:

For the investigation and demonstration within the United States to determine the best method of obtaining potash on a commercial scale, $127,600: Provided, That the product obtained from such experimentation may be sold at a price to be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture, and the amount obtained from the sale thereof shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Entomology," on page 56, line 4, after the word "nuts," to strike out "$83,380" and insert "$93,380"; so as to read:

For investigations of insects affecting deciduous fruits, orchards, vineyards, and nuts, $93,380.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 57, line 12, after the words "general expenses," to strike out "$557,300" and insert "$567,300"; so as to make the clause read:

In all, for general expenses, $567,300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 58, line 11, after the words "Bureau of Entomology," to strike out "$976,680," and insert "$986,680"; so as to make the clause read:

Total for Bureau of Entomology, $986,680.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Biological Survey," on page 60, line 25, after the words "wild animals," to strike out:

Provided further, That of this sum $10,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, shall be used for the purpose of investigating the extent and effect of the killing and harassing by dogs of sheep and other meat-producing animals and of the best methods for reducing and preventing the same;

So as to make the clause read:

For investigating the food habits of North American birds and mammals in relation to agriculture, horticulture, and forestry, including experiments and demonstrations in destroying wolves, coyotes, prairie dogs, and other animals injurious to agriculture and animal husbandry, and for investigations and experiments in connection with rearing of fur-bearing animals, including mink and marten, $394,820: Provided, That of this sum $15,000 shall be used for the destruction of ground squirrels on the national forests, and other public lands: And provided also, That of this sum not less than $125,000 shall be used on the national forests and the public domain in destroying wolves, coyotes, and other animals injurious to agriculture, animal husbandry, and wild game: And provided further, That of this sum not more than $125,000 shall be used on the public lands, national forests, and elsewhere in the Western and Northwestern States for the protection of stock and other domestic animals through the suppression of rabies by the destruction of wolves, coyotes, and other predatory wild animals.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I simply desire at this time to congratulate the Senate, if it is about to adopt this amendment, on its wisdom in refraining from the attempt to teach people how to kill dogs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 61, line 13, after the words "insectivorous birds," to insert "and any act of Congress to give effect to the treaty with Great Britain relating to migratory birds"; so as to make the clause read:

For all necessary expenses for enforcing the provisions of the act approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stats. L., pp. 847 and 848), relating to the protection of migratory game and insectivorous birds, and any act of Congress to give effect to the treaty with Great Britain relating to migratory birds, and for cooperation with local authorities in the protection of migratory birds, and for necessary investigations connected therewith, $50,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator having the bill in charge to make an explanation of that amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. First, I should very much like to have the paragraph read and then read in conjunction with the proposed amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary again read the clause as proposed to be amended.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I will ask that this section be passed over until the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] returns to the Chamber. He will be here in a moment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the treaty with Great Britain relating to migratory birds has not yet been ratified, and it seems to me rather strange that we should put into an appropriation bill an item referring to a treaty that is yet to be ratified by Great Britain and the United States. The only question in my mind is whether or not it is really consistent legislation.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, though I am not a member of this committee, I am very sure there was some good reason for putting the amendment into the bill. In order that the chairman of the committee may be permitted to explain it, I ask that the section may be passed over until he returns, which will be in a few moments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be temporarily passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, under the subhead "Bureau of Public Roads," on page 76, line 2, after the word "expenses," to strike out "$25,000" and insert "$60,900, of which sum $35,900 shall be made immediately available," so as to make the clause read:

For investigating farm domestic water supply and drainage disposal, the construction of farm buildings, and other rural engineering problems involving mechanical principles, including the erection of such structures outside of the District of Columbia as may be necessary for experimental purposes only, the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, supplies, and all other necessary expenses, $60,900, of which sum $35,900 shall be made immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 76, line 7, after the words "general expenses," to strike out "$489,520" and insert "$525,420." so as to make the clause read:

In all, for general expenses, $525,420.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 76, line 8, after the words "Public Roads," to strike out "$593,540" and insert "$629,440," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Bureau of Public Roads, $629,440.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Markets," on page 79, after line 7, to strike out—

For enabling the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and certify to shippers the condition as to soundness of fruit, vegetables, and other perishable farm products when received at such important central markets as the Secretary of Agriculture may from time to time designate and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, including payment of such fees as will cover the cost of the service rendered: Provided, That certificates issued by the authorized agents of the department shall be received in all courts as prima facie evidence of the truth of the statements therein contained, $113,000.

And insert—

For enabling the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and certify to shippers and other interested parties the quality and condition of fruits, vegetables, and other perishable farm products when received at such important central markets as the Secretary of Agriculture may from time to time designate, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, including payment of such fees as will be reasonable for the service rendered: Provided, That certificates issued by the authorized agents of the department shall be received in all courts of the United States as prima facie evidence of the truth of the statements therein contained, $113,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 81, after line 15, to insert:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to install an experimental flour mill, baking and other apparatus, in order to investigate the milling and baking qualities of wheat and other grains, including the payment of rent in the city of Washington, $50,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I do not care particularly to discuss this amendment, but I have a matter which I wish to put in the RECORD, and I will take this opportunity to do it.

At the last session of Congress a bill looking to the control of food products was prepared and sent to Congress by the administration. In that bill provision was made giving the President full control over the matter of the use of food products in the manufacture of malt, vinous, and distilled liquors. When the matter came up in Congress, Congress was prepared to relieve the President from that responsibility and prohibit by positive act the use of food products in the manufacture of liquors of this kind. One body of Congress adopted a positive provision to that effect. That provision was substantially reported by the Senate committee, and the Senate was prepared to pass it, when the President practically requested us to leave that authority in him and place upon him that responsibility. That was done; and although Congress did prohibit the manufacture of distilled spirits, Congress, as the President requested, left the authority in him and the power in him to permit or prohibit the use of food products in the manufacture of malt and vinous liquors.

There is a tremendous sentiment throughout the country in favor of war prohibition independent of the merits of the question in times of peace, and much pressure has been brought upon Congress; but the country is beginning to understand and realize that this power is in the hands of the President, that the responsibility is his, and that while Congress was perfectly willing to assume this responsibility and discharge this duty, it left it with the President at his own request.

A few days ago, Mr. President, one of the most remarkable petitions ever prepared was presented to the President of the United States, asking in very respectful terms that he exercise the power that Congress has given him and, as a war measure, prohibit the further use of grain and other food products in the manufacture of malt and vinous liquors. That petition was signed by many of the most prominent women of this country of every class and occupation. It was signed by the representatives of all of the temperance organizations in the United States. It represented over 6,000,000 of the patriotic women of this country, of the most representative character, not only in their own persons but in those whom they represented as the officials of organizations of various kinds. This was distinctly a "winning of the war" appeal by the patriotic women of this country, who are doing everything in their power to bring this war to a successful termination. The women of America are doing their part now, as they have always done in the history of the Nation, and they presented the petition to the President as a war proposition. They believed that it would have much to do with the winning of the war, and as patriots they presented it to him and not as partisans of any particular idea.

Mr. President, I have the letter transmitting this petition to the President. I have also the petition signed by about a thousand of the most representative women in this country. Not all of the representative women of the country who would have signed it have signed it, simply because they did not have the opportunity; but these women do represent the patriotic, loyal sentiment of the great majority of the women of the Republic.

I think this is the first time in the history of the temperance movement that all of the leading organizations of women have united in behalf of a particular proposition. They have all united in behalf of this proposition and they are all represented in the petition that was presented to the President.

This petition is signed by and represents the women whose husbands, sons, and brothers are in training camps, on ships, and at the battle front. They favor the conservation of our food products for the boys at the front, and are denying themselves and will deny themselves to the limit. They favor the use of food products for bread rather than for beer, and make this appeal to the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy as stanch patriots whose highest aim and purpose now is "to win the war."

This petition was prompted by that great organization the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and, in my judgment, will take rank among the historic petitions of the world. I have, as I have said, the letter tendering this petition to the President; I have the petition with the names which was presented to him March 1, and also a summary of the petition and the character and standing of the signers. I ask that they be printed in full in the RECORD, including the names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: We deeply appreciate the privilege of presenting to you a memorial representing 6,000,000 women patriots of the United States.

We believe this is the first petition in the history of our country in which all leading organizations of women—civic, fraternal, social, patriotic, and religious—as well as hundreds of notable women in the educational and official life of the Republic, have united. It comes to you, Mr. President, as the voice of the women of America. It comes to you, our Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, at the time of an appalling crisis which peculiarly concerns the mothers of the Nation.

Educated by the Government to believe that food will win the war, these women, whose magnificent war service and sacrifice are everywhere attested, plead for the maximum conservation of food materials for the duration of the war. They earnestly and respectfully ask that all food materials now used in the production of malt liquors be diverted to food supplies desperately needed by our Army and the armies of the allies.

On behalf of the 6,000,000 petitioners, Mr. President, we thank you for the steps in this direction already taken, and we beg your early and favorable consideration of the prayer of the memorial we have the honor to place in your hands.

ANNA A. GORDON,
President National Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

To Hon. WOODROW WILSON,
President of the United States:

Believing that the women of the United States are loyally doing their utmost in our national crisis to carry out all Government plans for the conservation of food; and

Realizing that there is still an alarming waste of foodstuffs in the production of malt and vinous liquors;

We, in behalf of mothers, wives, daughters, sisters, and sweethearts of enlisted men, appeal to you, our Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, to prohibit the further waste of these foodstuffs in the production of malt and vinous liquors during the period of the war.

Headed by the name of Mrs. Frances F. Cleveland Preston, a notable petition representing nearly 6,000,000 women was presented to the President to-day, urging that the production of malt liquors in the United States be stopped in the interest of the conservation of foodstuffs. The petition states that the grain being used in the brewing of beer and ale and other malt beverages in America is enough to make more than 4,000,000 loaves of bread daily. It also states that the women of America ask that this great saving be made by a proclamation of the President.

The petition contains the official signatures of 28 presidents of national organizations, representing 5,917,976 women. Among these signatures are to be found the names of Mrs. Josiah Evans Cowles, president General Federation of Women's Clubs; Mrs. George Thacher Guernsey, president general Daughters American Revolution; Mrs. H. K. Schoff, president National Congress of Mothers and Parent-Teacher Association; Mrs. Robert E. Speer, president of the Young Women's Christian Association of America; Myra Kingman Miller, President National Federation of College Women; Anna A. Gordon, president National Woman's Christian Temperance Union.

In addition to this official group there are individual signatures of almost a thousand noted women of America. Among the signers are many wives of United States Senators and Representatives, wives of governors and former governors, women members of State legislatures, and Miss JEANNETTE RANKIN, of Montana, the woman Member of the National Congress.

Among the educators who have signed the petition are Mrs. C. C. Bradford, president National Education Association; Ella Flagg Young; Julia C. Lathrop; Mary E. Wooley, president Mount Holyoke College; Ella F. Pendleton, president Wellesley College; M. Carey Thomas, president Bryn Mawr College; and the dean of women of many of the largest colleges in America.

With the individual group of petitioners are presidents and chairmen of State organizations, such as Colonial Dames, Daughters American Revolution, Woman's Christian Temperance Union, Red Cross societies, Florence Crittenton missions, missionary societies of all denominations, equal-suffrage associations, Federation Women's Clubs, woman's committees Council National Defense, Dames of Loyal Legion, Woman's Liberty Loan Committee, Woman's Relief Corps, National League for Women's Service, Federation Music Clubs, war work councils, Order Eastern Star, Mother's Congress and parent-teacher associations, Juvenile Protective Association, State boards charities and corrections, Sunshine Society, Good Government Leagues, Royal Neighbors, Anti-Suffrage Association, Ladies' of the Grand Army of the Republic, Graduate Nurses' Association, Home Makers' Associations, Child Welfare Leagues, International Order King's Daughters and Sons, Ladies of the Maccabees, consumers' leagues, humane education societies, woman's party, Catholic altar societies, medical women's associations, associations collegiate alumnæ, needlework guilds, woman's farm and garden associations, neighbors leagues; Rebekah assemblies, Pythian Sisters, playground associations, Council Jewish Women, United Daughters Confederacy, women's bank associations.

There are the signatures of women State officials in suffrage States—deputy commissioners public lands, members labor commissions, State factory inspectors, deputy superintendents public instruction, chairmen State public safety commissions, and assistant attorneys general.

Standing out conspicuously are the signatures of women of national reputation—Jane Addams, Hull House; Mrs. Raymond Robins; Laura Clay; Kate M. Gordon; Jean Gordon; Mrs. Truman H. Newberry; Daisy McLaurin Stevens, member Naval Commission on Training Activities; Maud Ballington Booth; Mrs. Frances C. Axtell, vice chairman United States Employees' Compensation Commission; Alice Stebbins Wells, president International Association of Policewomen; Katherine Bement Davis; Anna Jarvis, founder Mother's Day; Kate Waller Barrett; Helen Ring Robinson; Mrs. John A. Logan.

Of wives of prominent men in America, Mrs. Philander P. Claxton, Mrs. William J. Bryan, Mrs. Wilfred T. Grenfell, Mrs. Stephen S. Wise, Mrs. Booth Tarkington, Mrs. Owen Lovejoy, Mrs. Luther Burbank, and wives of United States Senators and Representatives, of governors, of members State supreme courts, attorneys general, State senators and representatives, State auditors, commissioners labor, secretaries state.

Among the petitioners are authors, editors, artists penwomen, doctors, lawyers. From almost every State in the Union are the signatures of journalists. Conspicuous are the names of the authors, Alice Hegan Rice, Gene Stratton Porter, Marietta Holley; of artists and illustrators, Mary Mears, Jessie Wilcox Smith, and Annetta St. Gaudens.

It is a "win-the-war" appeal from women who are responding to all conservation requests of the United States Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 81, line 24, after the words "general expenses," to strike out "$961,705" and insert "$1,011,705," so as to make the clause read:

In all, for general expenses, $1,011,705.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 82, line 24, after the words "Bureau of Markets," to strike out "$1,973,255" and insert "$2,023,255," so as to make the clause read:

Total for Bureau of Markets, $2,023,255.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 82, after line 24, to insert:

In the performance of the duties required of the Bureau of Markets in the administration or enforcement of provisions of acts (United States cotton-futures act, 39 Stat. L., 476; United States grain standards act, 39 Stat. L., 482; United States warehouse act, 39 Stat. L., 486; standard container act, 39 Stat. L., 673; and the acts making annual appropriations for the Department of Agriculture) relating to the Department of Agriculture, the Secretary of Agriculture, or any representative authorized by him for the purpose, shall have power to administer oaths, examine witnesses, and call for the production of books and papers during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 85, line 26, after the words "ordinary work," to strike out "$25,195,173" and insert "$25,500,333," so as to make the clause read:

Total, Department of Agriculture, for routine and ordinary work, $25,500,333.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Miscellaneous," on page 91, line 6, after the word "distribution," to strike out "$400,000," and insert "$700,000," so as to make the clause read:

To conduct surveys and inspections in Texas or in any other State to detect any infestation and to conduct such control measures, including the establishment of cotton-free areas, in cooperation with the State of Texas or other States concerned, as may be necessary to stamp out such infestation, to establish in cooperation with the States concerned a zone or zones free from cotton culture on or near the border of any State or States adjacent to Mexico, and to cooperate with the Mexican Government or local Mexican authorities, or otherwise, by undertaking in Mexico such measures for the extermination of the pink bollworm of cotton as shall be determined to be practicable from surveys showing its distribution, $700,000: Provided, That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be used to pay the cost or value of crops or other property injured or destroyed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask that the entire provision relating to the comparatively new pest called the pink bollworm be read, commencing in line 23, page 89.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Eradication of pink bollworm: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to meet the emergency caused by the existence of the pink bollworm of cotton in Mexico, and to prevent the establishment of such insect in the United States by the employment of all means necessary, including rent outside of the District of Columbia and the employment of persons and means in the city of Washington and elsewhere, as follows:

To prevent the movement of cotton and cotton seed from Mexico into the United States, including the regulation of the entry into the United States of railway cars and other vehicles, and freight, express, baggage, or other materials from Mexico, and the inspection, cleaning, and disinfection thereof, $50,000;

To make surveys to determine the actual distribution of the pink bollworm in Mexico and to exterminate local infestations in Mexico near the border of the United States, in cooperation with the Mexican Government or local Mexican authorities, $25,000;

To investigate in Mexico or elsewhere the pink bollworm as a basis for control measures, $25,000;

To conduct surveys and inspections in Texas or in any other State to detect any infestation and to conduct such control measures, including the establishment of cotton-free areas, in cooperation with the State of Texas or other States concerned, as may be necessary to stamp out such infestation, to establish in cooperation with the States concerned a zone or zones free from cotton culture on or near the border of any State or States adjacent to Mexico, and to cooperate with the Mexican Government or local Mexican authorities, or otherwise, by undertaking in Mexico such measures for the extermination of the pink bollworm of cotton as shall be determined to be practicable from surveys showing its distribution, $400,000: Provided, That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be used to pay the cost or value of crops or other property injured or destroyed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator in charge of the bill what the appropriation was last year for the eradication of this pest called the pink bollworm?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that there was no appropriation under this item last year. It is a new pest that has been introduced, I believe, into Mexico and comes to the United States from Mexico.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is the Senator quite sure that there was no appropriation last year? There surely was at some time an appropriation.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That was for the boll weevil.

Mr. GORE. I fear the Senator has confused this with the Mexican boll weevil.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not at all. I know all about that appropriation; but I am very sure that last year the question was up as to this new pest, called the pink bollworm.

Mr. GORE. There was an item in regard to it in the urgent deficiency bill, not in the Agriculture appropriation bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; that is it. Can the Senator state the amount?

Mr. GORE. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. GALLINGER. We have made quite a jump in this matter. It is taking a wide range now. There are several paragraphs relating to it—one of $50,000, another of $25,000, another of $25,000, and another of $700,000. It seems to me that we are traveling at rather a rapid rate, a most extraordinary rate, concerning this new pest.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that the appropriation is based on the theory that it is better to prevent the spread of this pest than to wait until it has spread and then try to eradicate it. It has lately come over from Mexico. It is the most deadly and destructive pest which has yet attacked the cotton plant; and in this case we have raised the appropriation to the amount estimated by the department. They estimated $800,000.

Mr. GALLINGER. Can the Senator tell the Senate how extensive this pest is, so far as our own territory is concerned?

Mr. GORE. I think not very extensive at this time. I have here a letter from the department that I will have read to the Senate, and also a suggested amendment to this provision.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that I thought, from the reading of the text, that this was rather a preventive measure.

Mr. GORE. It is; yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. They are going to arrest it at the Mexican border and keep it on Mexican territory.

Mr. GORE. That is so.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish we might do that, because I think it is a good thing to keep those pests on Mexican soil rather than on the soil of the United States.

Mr. GORE. Yes; and they have no troubles down there. We have enough of our own already.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, they have some, I think, in Mexico at the present time.

Mr. GORE. I believe Abe Martin said he would rather be wrong than be President of Mexico.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator desire to have that letter read? I am interested in this matter, but I will not ask for it.

Mr. GORE. Then I will not inflict it on the Senate.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I will state that even as far away from the Mexican line as Mississippi the cotton planters are very much exercised over the appearance of this pest. Recently a convention of the planters of the entire State was held at the capital, and it was stated that the pest really menaces the entire cotton industry of the South if it is not stopped.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I was rather startled by recalling the fact that we had made a small appropriation for this purpose—I had forgotten what appropriation bill it was in, but my memory is refreshed by the suggestion of the Senator from Oklahoma that it was $250,000—and now $800,000 is asked; and yet the bug is not yet on the territory of the United States to any considerable extent.

Mr. GORE. I think it is in Texas to some extent.

Mr. GALLINGER. To some extent?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir; in Texas.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It is in several States.

Mr. GALLINGER. I presume we have got to try to exterminate this insect if we can. I am much interested in the development of the cotton industry, which seems to be doing mighty well in these days, when cotton is selling at $180 a bale.

Mr. GORE. No; about $150 to $170. Including the seed, it would be more, however.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; about $180 a bale. But however that may be, Mr. President, we want to protect that great crop. It is very essential to our own welfare and to the conduct of the war. I have sometimes thought it ought to be taxed; but that, I presume, we will never accomplish, and perhaps we ought not. I am not so sure on that point. But the rapid increase in these appropriations attracted my attention, and I wanted to ask this question. If this insect is as deadly as is suggested to the culture of cotton, of course this will be a wise appropriation, provided we can halt its progress into the cotton States; but it was so great a jump from the appropriation of last year to this proposed appropriation that I wanted some information about it.

The truth is, it seems to have become rather an industry to hunt up some insect that is going to attack an agricultural crop. Somebody said to me that the sweet potatoes are in danger. I do not know how that is. It has been suggested to me that we ought to look after some insect that threatens that crop; and I shall be very sorry if that crop is in danger or in danger of being destroyed.

I am satisfied with this matter so far as the answer concerning it is concerned, and shall make no objection to it, beyond expressing the hope that we may not be met by a proposed appropriation of $1,600,000 next year; and I trust they will be able to stop the ravages of that pink insect at the Rio Grande. That is where it ought to be. It ought to be relegated to Mexican soil, and kept there, rather than to come into Texas or any other State of the Union.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I entirely coincide with the Senator, in the hope that we can stay this invader at the border. I now send to the desk an amendment suggested by the department to the amendment which has just been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 90, at the end of line 11, it is proposed to insert——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say to the Senator from Oklahoma that that will be an amendment to the bill and not an amendment to this amendment. The question is on the adoption of the amendment to strike out "$400,000" and insert "$700,000." This has not any relevancy to that amendment.

Mr. GORE. Yes; it does not refer to the amendment, but to the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, before the committee amendment is adopted I want to ask the chairman of the committee, or some Senator from one of the cotton States, to state, in a few words, if possible, the results thus far accomplished under the appropriations which have been made by Congress for several years in the attempt to eradicate the boll weevil. What has been done with an average of $600,000 per year?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will say that the Government has not been able to eradicate the weevil, but on account of the weevil the production of cotton was reduced. I understand, as much as 75 per cent in some portions of the great cotton belt of Texas. In Louisiana and in Mississippi there was a corresponding reduction when the pest first made its appearance in that region, but the department has succeeded, by cooperative methods with farmers, in restoring the production of cotton to the old level by improved cultural methods and ways and means of circumventing the weevil and counteracting its effects, but not in the way of direct extermination of the weevil itself.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is it the opinion of the Senator that it is necessary to continue to appropriate this sum indefinitely in order to circumvent the weevil?

Mr. GORE. I think for the present it is, because the weevil has not extended itself over the entire cotton country, but is extending its invasion eastward all the while, and it is necessary to institute these ways and means wherever it does make its advance; and until that is done I presume the necessity will continue. I imagine that the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] or the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] could give some statistics as to the actual losses from the appearance of the weevil in those two States. They have been enormous.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course I realize that the losses have been very, very severe, but I think it can be contended that after this series of years we should have some report as to progress.

Mr. GORE. I think I might, however, express the opinion that this appropriation will not disappear.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I never knew one that did, Mr. President.

Mr. GORE. That is too true; but I will say to the Senator that it is connected in a way with the general demonstration work and the improvement of agriculture generally; and the appropriations were growing so large, and the benefits were so great and were so well recognized, that Senators from other sections insisted that corresponding appropriations be made to carry forward the same sort of work in their States, notwithstanding they were not cotton-growing States. That has been done. Demonstration agents all over the country have grown out of that; and I think the appropriations for other sections outside of the cotton States amounted to something more than $400,000 a year or two ago, and I think they are above that now. So it has come to be a permanent part of our agricultural education, and to some extent in the cotton States this is really a misnomer.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is just what I was driving at. Is not this a misnomer?

Mr. GORE. Yes; it is. It was born of this necessity, but its name has never been changed; and the service has been extended, I think, to the entire country. There are 2,860 counties in the United States. I think that 2,100 counties now have agents corresponding to those who were evolved in the Southern States to meet this situation; and they are being rapidly extended to all the counties.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I do not desire to be overinquisitive. I have had a fleeting idea that this boll-weevil appropriation was, in fact, not alone an appropriation for stamping out the boll weevil; that it was an appropriation to extend the farm-agent system throughout the counties. Now, I am in entire sympathy with the extension of that system; and I remember also, as the Senator has already reminded the Senate, that when these great appropriations were first commenced another section of the country said: "We must have our share."

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. WADSWORTH. So they promptly got their share.

Mr. GORE. They did; yes, sir.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And it has been going on ever since. One part of the country calls it the farm county agents' work and another part of the country says: "We are chasing the boll weevil with it."

Mr. GORE. That is the state of facts.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Very well. I am glad to have it cleared up.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator that the Government has never professed to be able to eradicate the boll weevil. It has discovered no ways and means of combating the weevil so as to exterminate the insect itself; but it has so countervailed its ravages as to restore the production of cotton to normal, even where the weevil was most riotous where it first made its appearance.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I venture the hope that the pink boll weevil will not give rise to a pink-colored farm agent.

Mr. GORE. If so, then there will probably be a pink invader of some sort in all sections of the country. I will say that this appropriation, I think, has been abundantly rewarded, not only in the Southern States but in other States, although agriculture was perhaps more scientific in other sections than in the South; but it has been serviceable even in those States, and abundantly so in the Southern States.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wanted to ask the Senator about the character of this pink boll weevil and what damage it does.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I shall have to have read the letter of the department to which I referred a few moments ago.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Can not the Senator state the matter just briefly?

Mr. GORE. It destroys the fruit entirely. It even destroys the seed, so that it will not reproduce.

Mr. JONES of Washington. To what extent has it gotten into our territory?

Mr. GORE. I think only to a limited extent, and only in the State of Texas, as I am informed.

Mr. JONES of Washington. And it is hoped, by this appropriation and under this appropriation, to devise ways and means, in conjunction with the Mexican authorities, to keep it out of our territory, at least?

Mr. GORE. That is the point exactly; yes, sir—to eradicate where it has already made its appearance, and so to inspect and disinfect cars coming over as to prevent its introduction in the future.

Mr. JONES of Washington. How is it propagated? That is, I mean, how does it get into this country from Mexico?

Mr. GORE. It is supposed to have come in in cars in which cotton seed has been shipped from Mexico.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It comes in with the seed?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir; or it comes in cars which have been used for the shipment of seed.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Have we been inspecting these cars during the last year, and have we tried to prevent its being brought in?

Mr. GORE. I do not know to what extent that has been done. I assume so, and I assume also that the letter explains the matter fully. I had not expected to reach this item this afternoon. Consequently I am not familiar with the contents of the letter.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to express my surprise to the Senator from New York that he should be surprised to discover in this bill an appropriation of this nature. We have a number of appropriations called revolving appropriations. They are so called because they never revolve; they only jam.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma now proposes an amendment, following line 9, on page 91, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert, on page 91, after line 9:

Any moneys hereafter received by the United States in payment of charges fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture on account of such cleaning and disinfection at plants constructed therefor out of any appropriation made on account of the pink bollworm are hereby appropriated and made immediately available during the continuance of such emergency, in the discretion of the Secretary, for expenditures necessary to prevent the movement of cotton and cotton seed from Mexico into the United States and the establishment of the pink bollworm in the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, do I understand that this is a committee amendment?

Mr. GORE. No, sir. The committee did not report it. It was sent up by the department since the bill was reported.

Mr. SMOOT. Did the Senator having the bill in charge offer this amendment?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be stated again, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated again.

The Secretary again stated the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that may be necessary; but I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that that is reviving a practice that grew to such an extent that we were compelled to stop it by legislation, and to provide that all moneys received from all sources should go into the Treasury of the United States, and all moneys to be appropriated should be carried in a regular appropriation bill for any expense that the Government desired to undertake. I do not believe that the Senator having the bill in charge can say how much money will come from these charges. Was there any information on that subject before the committee?

Mr. GORE. I have no estimate on that subject, Mr. President. I will say, while I am interrupting the Senator, that I think the principle he lays down is a sound one, generally speaking.

Mr. SMOOT. There is not any doubt about its being a sound principle. If I wanted to take the time of the Senate this afternoon, I could rehearse here dozens of cases where it has been abused in the most flagrant manner; and as far as I am concerned, I believe that every single cent that is collected from any source by the agencies of the Government of the United States ought to go into the Treasury of the United States, and not a dollar of it ought to come out of the Treasury of the United States unless it is appropriated directly for the purposes named.

Mr. GORE. The Senator will remember, however, that we created a revolving fund of $150,000,000 under the food-control act.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, we have done so many things during the past year that can not be defended that I do not want to take time now even to undertake to defend that kind of legislation.

Mr. GORE. No; I do not cite that as justification for this practice.

Mr. SMOOT. I should very much prefer that whatever charges are imposed by the Secretary of Agriculture for the cleaning under this paragraph shall go in the regular channels. Then, if an additional appropriation is wanted by him for this purpose, let him come to Congress and ask for the appropriation, and I have no doubt that it will be granted.

I hope the amendment will be rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. [Putting the question.] By the sound the ayes seem to have it.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. WADSWORTH called for a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A division is called for.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest that the question be stated again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and read by the Secretary.

On a division, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Jones, N. Mex.	Ransdell	Sutherland
Brandegee	Jones, Wash.	Reed	Swanson
Culberson	McCumber	Robinson	Thomas
Curtis	McNary	Saulsbury	Thompson
France	Martin	Shafroth	Trammell
Gallinger	Myers	Sheppard	Vardaman
Gerry	New	Smith, Ga.	Wadsworth
Gore	Norris	Smith, Md.	Warren
Gronna	Overman	Smith, Mich.	Williams
Henderson	Page	Smoot

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] and the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] on official business. I will let this announcement stand for the balance of the afternoon.

Mr. ROBINSON. The junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], and the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] are absent from the Senate Chamber on business of the Senate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the absence of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] on official business, and the unavoidable absence of the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. COLT, Mr. HARDWICK, Mr. KING, Mr. LODGE, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, Mr. TILLMAN, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and Mr. WOLCOTT answered to their names when called.

Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. KENDRICK, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. JOHNSON of California, Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota, and Mr. NUGENT entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill at line 10, page 91, and read as follows:

No part of any amount herein appropriated shall be used to pay salaries or for personal services in any department, bureau, or office in the District of Columbia which does not, subject to the provisions and exceptions of section 7 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act, approved March 15, 1898, require eight hours of labor each day.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I move to strike out lines 10 to 16, which have just been read.

Mr. GORE. I ask that that amendment may go over.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I understand the bill is being read merely for action upon the amendments of the committee at the present time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Was there a unanimous-consent agreement to that effect?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There was.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Then I am willing to have the matter passed over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be passed over.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee if he expects to dispose of the bill this evening?

Mr. GORE. I do not expect to dispose of the bill this afternoon.

Mr. BORAH. I will state the reason why I asked the question. I do not object to having the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas go over, but I do not want to remain here this afternoon, if I can help it, waiting for it if it is not coming up.

Mr. GORE. My impression is that it will not come up this afternoon. I apprehend that it will involve a good deal of discussion. There are other items that will not take much time, and I prefer to dispose of those first. I think the Senator will be safe in going away.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 91, after line 16, to insert the following:

That any moneys heretofore or hereafter received by the United States for or in connection with the disposition of nitrate of soda pursuant to section 27 of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917 (Public, No. 41, 65th Cong.), are hereby appropriated and made immediately available as a revolving fund to be used at the discretion of the President for further carrying out the purposes of said section and extending its operation throughout the period of the existing war as ascertained and proclaimed in accordance with section 24 of said act: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed as prohibiting the sale or disposal of any nitrates remaining on hand at the time of, or contracted for previous to, such termination.

Mr. SMOOT. The same objection could be urged against this amendment that is urged against the paragraph beginning after the word "destroyed," in line 9 on page 91. This, however, is an emergency matter and it refers particularly to the question of securing a product that is absolutely necessary during the continuation of this war. For that purpose, and that only, I shall not object to its adoption, but the principle of it, as I stated before, is absolutely wrong.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 92, after line 9, to insert:

That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $250,000, to be used and expended by the Secretary of Agriculture as herein provided in offering and awarding prizes and premiums for the encouragement of the growing of staple foodstuffs on the farms throughout the country. The money appropriated by this paragraph shall be apportioned among the several States in accordance with the value of the farm products as shown by the last Federal census, and shall be expended under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. GORE. I desire to offer a substitute for this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield?

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to inquire of the Senator having charge of the bill whether there is a sum of $250,000 in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated?

Mr. GORE. We expect to issue Liberty bonds to the amount of $3,600,000,000. I do not think it is all appropriated.

Mr. THOMAS. If there is that amount in the Treasury, it is blessed news to the country.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator from Oklahoma that I think he is rather mistaken when he says it has not all been appropriated. It has already been appropriated.

Mr. GORE. I believe it has a time or two over.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the money is not there, they can not get it.

Mr. GORE. I thank the Senator for that suggestion. That is the only thing that will stand them off, I think.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator offers a substitute?

Mr. GORE. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understand from reading the section that we are going to engage in giving prizes.

Mr. GORE. The substitute relates to another paragraph.

Mr. GALLINGER. We used to give chromos and now we are going to give money, I suppose, for certain experiments in agriculture.

Mr. THOMAS. Only in case the money is not otherwise appropriated. I do not think there is any danger of doing that.

Mr. GALLINGER. We may get some money in the Treasury——

Mr. OVERMAN. After the war is over.

Mr. GALLINGER. Before the war is over; after the taxes which are becoming due are collected. Then we may have money.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. GORE. I yield if I have the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it is very entertaining to hear the plaintive wailing begin the minute it is proposed to appropriate a little money to the farmers of this country. I did not hear any of it the other day when it was proposed to give the railroads very favorable terms for the period of the war.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Senator allow an interruption?

Mr. REED. As soon as I conclude the sentence. What we have been doing to the farmer up to this time is to take his market away from him, fix his prices, upset all his calculations, and leave him at the mercy of abnormal conditions made worse by the abnormal acts of some abnormal men. That goes without challenge, and when it is proposed to give a little money to help the agriculturist it arouses a great deal of comment.

But a few days ago, as I looked over the floor of this Chamber, it seemed to me that there was about the same enthusiasm in trying to take care of the railroads handsomely that you would find among the aspirants for a premium among a lot of bread makers at a country fair. Everybody was there to do his best. Now, I hope that even if there is no money otherwise appropriated from the Treasury we will not begin cutting down the farmer. Whether there is any money otherwise appropriated now or not, there will be plenty of money appropriated in this Chamber within the next 30 days, plenty of thousands of dollars, plenty of millions of dollars, and probably plenty of thousands of millions of dollars, and it will then be done in the high name of patriotism, and whoever dares hold out an arresting hand or raise a questioning voice will be classed as an enemy of his country. But when it is proposed to spend a few dollars with the farmer that may help to make better crops, produce more food for the world, it at once becomes the object of scorn and contemptuous remark.

I hope the bill will not be treated in that form.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri will recall that so far as I am concerned——

Mr. REED. Evidently, I did not mean my remarks to apply at all to the Senator from Colorado. I was referring to the general situation.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course I accept the Senator's explanation, but his remarks were of so sweeping a character that it called for a statement from myself.

Let me say, while I have the floor, that it is my intention to vote for every appropriation which I think is absolutely necessary for the prosecution of the war or for the proper conduct of the Government's business. My objection to many of the items of this bill is not a new one. I have opposed them in past years because I have felt that they were not essential.

I made the remark before the Senator from Missouri came in that I had become so accustomed to see every appropriation to which I objected pass the Senate that I was becoming somewhat discouraged. I have no doubt that my attempt in this regard will be another instance of love's labor lost. I am not objecting to any of these items because this is an agricultural bill any more than I objected to the very large rewards that were recently awarded to the railroads because the bill affected the railroads. In each instance my criticisms have been designed to center attention upon conditions which, in my judgment, in the one case did not warrant so high a return, and which in this case do not seem to be now essential, when of all times we should be frugal.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the proposed amendment be read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 92, after line 9, insert:

That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $250,000, to be used and expended by the Secretary of Agriculture as herein provided in offering and awarding prizes and premiums for the encouragement of the growing of staple foodstuffs on the farms throughout the country. The money appropriated by this paragraph shall be apportioned among the several States in accordance with the value of the farm products as shown by the last Federal census, and shall be expended under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am not in the habit of opposing any appropriation which I think will actually advance the agriculture of this country, but this particular appropriation, which I confess meets my view for the first time, as I was absent from the meeting of the committee at which the amendment was adopted, excites my curiosity and fails to excite my admiration.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has said something about a more liberal treatment of the farmers of the country. He has recited how their markets have been taken away to a large extent and their prices fixed in many articles, generally fixed in a downward direction. What he says is true. I do not think this appropriation, however, will move one inch toward curing that evil. Here it is proposed to spend $250,000 to award prizes as a premium for the encouragement of the growing of stable foodstuffs. You might just as well appropriate 250 cents as $250,000 to a country of this size and expect that it is going to increase the production of stable foodstuffs.

This reads to me like a pleasant little sop to the farmer, something handed to him that does not cost the Government very much, and which, it is hoped, will make him feel good when he reads about it. You might just as well throw the money out in the middle of the street.

Let me suggest that you do not fool the farmers with this kind of legislation. There is item after item in this appropriation bill that seems to assume that the people who live in the rural parts of the United States are children, little babies, and have to be taught the simplest things—how to conduct their daily life, how to conduct their business from morning until night, and here we have a suggestion in this time of war, when the farmer knows perfectly well what the trouble is—it does not need the Congress nor the Secretary of Agriculture nor anybody else to tell him—to soften his feelings with the distribution of $250,000 in prizes. To my mind, it seems ridiculous.

I do not think there is any Senator here who will contend that the distribution of these prizes apportioned among the States in accordance with their relative production is going to encourage at this time the production of stable foodstuffs. The only thing that will encourage the production of stable foodstuffs at this time is a more liberal attitude on the part of the Food Administration, and nothing else. Had some of the Senators listened to the testimony that was given before the Committee on Agriculture within the last two weeks they would be, I am quite sure, deeply disturbed as to the food prospects in this country and in our allies' countries. The distribution of prizes, may I say to the Senator from Missouri, is not going to do any good. It is not going to make the farmer feel much better about it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to say at this point that I have been with the Banking and Currency Committee and had just come into the Chamber when I heard the remark made that occasioned my remark. I did not intend my remarks to apply to this question of prizes at all. I intended it to apply to the general cheese-paring policy that has been pursued here in regard to our agricultural bills in the Senate and the attitude that has been assumed so often. I am glad to have the opportunity to make that statement.

Now, while I am on my feet, if the Senator from New York will allow me, I wish to make a further statement. There is absolutely no question that the Senator from New York, so far as he has stated the case, has stated the absolute fact with regard to the conditions that confront the country.

I expect in a day or two to pay some attention to this policy that has produced a higher price for rye and barley and inferior grain than wheat is permitted to bring, to this policy that makes it more profitable for a farmer to plant rye and barley and oats than it does to plant wheat, and much more profitable to plant corn than either, to this policy that is causing thousands of immature hogs to be marketed because the corn is worth more in the bin than it is when it has been transformed into pork, to this policy of the Food Administration that has produced consternation among the farmers of this country from one end to the other, and that instead of giving us that stability which is necessary to investment and to labor has given us instability, to this policy which tells us for 8 or 10 months of the year to have meatless days, and then turns around and tells us all at once that we need to eat more meat in order to save wheat, this policy which tells us one day that there is wheat that can not be moved and that the railroads are to blame, and the next day when the cars are tendered backs away from the proposition and then assigns, as it assigned this morning, as the cause of wheat shortage, that the wheat is not in the country, when everybody knows that there has been less wheat shipped abroad than has been shipped in normal years.

I think that statement is so everybody knows it. I feel confident of it. I have not looked it up, but this policy, I say, that gave us meatless days and prescribed that we should eat chicken, and then turned around and provided that we should have meat days and that chicken should not be marketed, to this foolish, idiotic policy which seems to think you can save food by eating all of a certain kind one day and all of another kind the next day, alternating in that manner, instead of eating in the ordinary and usual way that human beings have done until our friend came here from England to reform the world and change the habits of the American people and to introduce a good deal of confusion into American life, and who, according to the Chicago Tribune, has taken into his working force some representatives of the packers who have been drawing very large salaries and who are the occasion of examination by Mr. Heney.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I simply desire to express the hope that the Senate will save this $250,000 and use it for something real.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not want to enter into any debate with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] concerning the Food Administration or the Food Administrator. What he said upon that subject is irrelevant to the present question under discussion. But I do want to answer something that was said by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

The Senator from New York criticizes the appropriation which is made for this purpose of encouraging improved agriculture by prizes and premiums as being absolutely useless amongst a people of 100,000,000 with our agricultural production. If the Senator from New York means by that that the appropriation ought to be larger, I agree with him, but if he means by it that prizes to men in the agricultural business do not have any effect upon the production of agricultural products I beg leave to disagree with him, and my disagreement grows out of observation and experience.

The prizes offered to the boys' corn clubs in the South—every southerner here will bear me out—have led almost to a revolution in corn production in that part of the country. It has not been very long since nearly every southern State imported the major part of its food for man and beast, while it raised other things. It has not been very long since in my State an average crop of corn was 19 to 22 bushels per acre, depend-
